From the Patrons View Point

What Causes People

to continually patronize one Picture Theatre in preference to another? Of course, location, appearances, films, etc. have a great deal to do with it, but quality of the picture is what builds up a steady patronage that makes the business profitable.

This depends largely on your light and if you are using any other device than a to step down your current you are not getting best results.

With our machine you can produce a clear, white, steady light that won't worry your "house" by continuous flickering and will surprise you with the difference it makes with the films.

It is the only device that can be changed instantly to any of the three intensities without breaking the circuit between adjustments.

But this is not all. We will guarantee that our Compensarc

Will Cut 65% from Your Light Bill and we'll send you one on 30 days' free trial to prove it.

We have a little 22 page booklet that explains all the reasons why If you want a better light at ¼ your present cost, send for it today. It's free.

Waterproof Facts

Nothing can be kept clean unless it is occasionally washed. A moving picture film is so easily injured by dirt, that instead of being an exception to this rule, it really needs washing more than most other things.

A clean film has so much more exhibiting value than a soiled and rainy one that it is a source of wonder that dirty films can be rented at any price.

Waterproofing puts a film in condition to be washed with soap and water, and if it is so washed once a week or every ten days, it will not alone keep clean and rainless, but soft and pliable as long as the sprocket holes will last.

Waterproofing intelligently cared for is the salvation of the photoplay entertainment.

We build a machine which will wash, dry, and polish a waterproof film in eight minutes.

THE WONDERFUL
KIMBLE
A. C. MOTOR

Kimble FAN

¶ It's the motor that does it. The fan is a mere incident, though a pleasant one.

IT DOES THE "IMPOSSIBLE"—

¶ Reverses instantly, from full speed forward to full speed back, by the pull of a chain.
This means you can push out foul air or suck in fresh air at will.

¶ VARIABLE SPEED—Runs fast or slow. The same chains do it.
This means that you lower your meter bill every minute you run at reduced speed, and when you run at full speed your bill is lower, in proportion to air moved, than with any other fan.

¶ Single phase; but can be run interchangeably on two-phase, or three-phase alternating current.

¶ LOWER PRICES—Less cost to buy, and less cost to run, in proportion to work done.

A Tale of the Sea

The Coffin Ship

is one of the most skillful sea stories that has ever been devised, and it plays up that "heart interest" element that has been such a feature of the best Thanhouser efforts. You MUST appeal to the heart and the sympathies to get a picture "over" best. Here the spectator's heart is drawn instantly to the bonnie bold skipper, his beauteous bride, and, lastly, to the father in his grief. Incidentally, let us tell you that the seascapes are nothing less than cinematographic gems. And the sinking ship—BUT wait till you SEE it sink!

She Was a Bit Old But—!

is surely one of the fowest propositions that ever figured in a moving picture yarn, and you'll laugh WITH HER at the right smart way she did business with a "business man." But the "business man" was at the bunco brand and a game he tried to play on grandma's granddaughter was a "con" one. Grandma, however, spoiled it for him. She pitted her own wits against the "business man's," and won by a mile.

NEW YORK June 10th, 1911

Mr. Exhibitor,
Dear Sir:-

Most of you have read my personal letters and you have seen the CROWN Western and Military pictures that I have featured. You will agree that each time that I have personally informed you of a special film that we were going to release, we furnished you with THE goods, and produced a real real, and it came up to every assertion and to all the expectations of both the exhibitor and the exchange. Therefore, I take great pleasure in inserting this letter in the trade journal in the shape of an advertisement, so that it may be before every eye that looks with interest for progress in the moving picture industry and for films of quality.

We beg to draw your special attention to our release of June 19th, "MOLLY PITCHER." I personally assure you it is the finest and largest military production that has ever been produced by THE CHAMPION FILM CO., although we are pioneers of absolutely correct military historic pictures. "MOLLY PITCHER" is not only wonderfully staged and stupendous production and the best picture that was shown on a curtain, but it is also educational.

I would consider it a personal favor if you ask to see this film and I feel sure that you will agree with me that it is the kind of productions that you want for your exchanges and theatres.

Let me hear from you regarding special advertising matter.

Yours very truly,

KALEM

A Mexican Rose Garden

The Story of a Peon's Romance

Released Wednesday June 21st Length 1010 feet

Senorita Inez, a great heiress, engages Jacinto as gardener. The poor gardener loves the heiress, but does not dare to make his passion known. Inez, realizing her love for the gardener, refuses a flattering offer of marriage. Jacinto, believing his love for Inez hopeless, decides to withdraw from the world. Inez, in bitter despair, seeks in vain for her lost love, and learns that Jacinto has become a monk. Fifty years elapse. Francisco Toledo applies for work and the old lady sees her own romance repeated. Senorita Inez makes a will which she hopes will bring happiness to Bonita. Bonita from a sense of duty refuses to leave the Senorita. On the old lady's death her will is read. In it all Senorita Inez's property is bequeathed to Bonita, providing she does not marry and that she maintains the flower garden in the same good condition in which it is. Francisco, hearing the contents of the will, believes there is no chance for him. Bonita disregards the will, however, and through pique destroys the garden and is advised by the old Notary that she loses the property. In the meantime, the monk Jacinto visits the rose garden, the grave-yard of his youth. Meeting Francisco, who is about to give up the struggle as did his predecessor and become a monk, the old monk dissuades him and tells him his love is not hopeless. The old Senorita's plan succeeds and the fond lovers are wedded. In a codicil to her will, Senorita Inez provides that "All that property forfeited by my niece Bonita, I give to Francisco Toledo." The happy young pair replant the garden while old father Jacinto, striving to forget his dead youth, prays for the Peace he has never known.

LEAN WOLF'S END

Showing the True Nature of the American Indian

Released Friday June 23rd Length 980 feet

At the Cheyenne agency, Lieut. French and Chaplain Scott are rivals for Alice Thorne's love. Alice, however, rejects the Chaplain and accepts the Lieutenant. Chaplain Scott in many ways shows his love for the Redman. Lean Wolf, prominent in his tribe, does not appreciate the horse play of the soldiers and commits an assault on one of the men. Chaplain Scott promises to help Lean Wolf if he will submit to arrest. Unrest among the Indians convinces Alice and the Chaplain that Lean Wolf must be set free or there will be an uprising. Lieutenant French demands that the unruly Indian, Lean Wolf, be hanged. The pleadings of Alice and the Chaplain are in vain. Chaplain Scott tells Lean Wolf of his doom and discovers that the Cheyennes are preparing to go on the war path. Lean Wolf is released at the Chaplain's request, but swears, "First white man I see, I kill."

We have been carefully preparing for the successful voyage of the Good Ship the "National" Program. We have our course carefully mapped out, our ship is completely stocked with the necessary provisions, and is manned by a competent crew.

Unlike our predecessors who set sail without a compass and drifted from one position to another, we realized that the success of the National Program lay in not leaving port until every detail had been carefully attended to. There have been countless things (each one of which will contribute to the success of the National) that required thought. Time was required to remove obstacles. This has been the cause of delay in placing our program in the hands of the exhibitors. We will sail on a hitherto uncharted sea, "Exclusiveness." We have been charting our course, taking soundings, stocking our ship and attending to all the details necessary to a successful voyage.

Sailing date of the Good Ship "National" will be announced in the course of the next few weeks. Exchange Men make early reservation, as the booking is limited.

Higher Ideals

The present upward trend of the moving picture could not be shown more strikingly than by grouping together the titles of the following films, released recently or about to be released in the near future: "The Fall of Troy," "A Tale of Two Cities," "Enoch Arden," "The Battle Hymn of the Republic," "The Maccabees," and "Faust."

Classic lore, the noblest fiction, history, poetry, and the drama are the very best sources from which the film-makers could possibly draw. The merit and praise due to a proper choice of subject, however, in themselves amount to but little. More than once have we seen a film-maker aim high in laudable ambition and select an admirable subject, only to tear it into tatters. The spirit in which the subject is approached and treated is the decisive element. Success can ultimately only spring from the brain of the film-maker. He must study his subject by day and sleep with it by night, and using all his experience and all his natural gifts and all means of preparation at his command he will far oftener succeed than fail. "Enoch Arden" will illustrate best what we mean. The film-maker here penetrated into the very heart of the subject, caught and absorbed the spirit of the poet and of the story and finally reproduced in pictures, more eloquent even than Tennyson's words, the simple pathos, the subtle characterization and the homely heroism of the tale, which has charmed and moved, and will, while the English language will last, again charm and move countless thousands. In some degree these observations apply to the makers of the other films as well.

It is further characteristic of the present higher ideals that of the subjects above mentioned, one consists of three reels and two consist of two reels each. The two and three-reel subject is indeed a necessary product of the higher ideal. It is bound to come and, in two or three years it will be the rule rather than the exception in all dramas and important scenic and educational subjects. We cannot do justice to the subjects especially worth while in a thousand feet of film. The play, even with the aid of the spoken word, takes from two to three hours to present, and cannot be condensed into a pantomime, which must be rushed through in generally less than thirty minutes.

The exhibitor who is intelligent enough to fall in with the new order of things will, by the rising tide, be borne on to success. It is, however, absolutely essential that two and three-reel subjects be shown together. To show one on Monday and the other on Thursday would be as sensible as exhibiting the acts of a play on different nights of the week. The public would never tolerate such foolishness, and the sooner the film-maker and the exchanges get together and recognize the paramount rights of the public and the exhibitor in this matter, the better.

Another factor that will have to be faced in connection with the two and three reel subject is the indispensable need of the human voice. The French, whose lead in the interpretation of mimic art none will be disposed to deny, have long ago given their judgment that the human voice is essential to the permanent success of the moving picture. There are two reasons for this. In the first place the strain on eye and brain becomes too severe when they are asked to look at and grasp as they look for the space of an hour or more; and in the second place the two or three reel subject needs, even for an audience above the average in point of education and intelligence, some explanation, and this explanation can be satisfactorily supplied by the human voice alone. The Moving Picture World will carry in its columns suggestions and complete lectures with every subject demanding it, and especially with two and three-reel subjects. The exhibitor must approach the putting on of these reels with understanding and thought, for much depends on the manner in which these films are presented to the public.

This is the form of entertainment that will draw valuable and permanent patronage to the moving picture houses, and while the farce comedy and the cheaper picture will always be with us, they must not be allowed to stand in the way, as the moving picture rises to fulfill its highest destiny.

The Exhibitor as a Teacher.

One of our fondest dreams is to some day see the exhibitor regarded as a teacher. We hope to see the time when he will be looked upon, as he passes by on the street, as some small light as the school-teacher or principal. We want him to attain a position of respect in which he will be looked up to by all who know him, especially the children. This very desirable state of affairs is not to be brought about by antagonistic methods—there must be co-operation between the school management and the exhibitor. Many exhibitors are inclined to believe that the school teacher is their worst enemy. In this they are partly right, for the school-teacher has much to lay at the door of the moving picture. The moving picture business has only itself to blame for the odium that has been cast upon it.

In some cities laws are being passed prohibiting the building of moving picture theatres within a certain distance of any school or church, which fact in itself clearly shows that there is no relation between them and the exhibitor. Instead of that, there is a line over which neither of them will cross. In most cases it is war to the knife between the school and the moving picture, which may be purely a matter of pride on one side or the other, or both. Wise exhibitors are beginning to realize that such a small thing as pride should not stand in the way of such a great and good thing as the moving picture, and in a good many cases, instead of waiting for the school authorities to come to them or meet them half way, they on their part have gone all the way, by way of compromise. There was once a man and his wife who disagreed as to the name of their first-born child. The mother wanted the child christened "Ethelbert," while the father stuck out for plain "Bill." After quarrelling awhile, they compromised on Ethelbert. That is the way in which some exhibitors are compromising with the school authorities.

There are a few isolated cases here and there throughout the United States where the exhibitors are cooperating with the school authorities with very good results. The unselfish way in which they have devoted their theaters at different times to public work has gained them a respect that has been very helpful to them. As time goes on, we hear of more and more exhibitors who are following out this very wise course, and as the number increases there appears to be some hope that our desire to see the exhibitor as a respected man in his community will come true. We believe that before very long this will be brought about by exhibitors of the better class. By the better class, we mean those exhibitors who are capable of writing a grammatical letter containing such sentiments as the following:

Malone, N. Y., May 10, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World:

The following may interest you and your readers. A few weeks ago, on a Sunday afternoon and evening, I gave a free exhibition of educational pictures, showing Edison's "Red Cross Seal," "The Man Who Learned," and the "Wedding Veil." My theater was packed all day and evening, and many were unable to gain admittance on account of the crowds. I had previously arranged with the local physicians here, and one of them was present at each performance and introduced short talks and suggestions both during and between the pictures.

Previous to the exhibition, none of the local physicians, the Anti-Tuberculosis Committee, or even the visiting nurse knew that there were in existence any pictures treating the subject of tuberculosis. The very following day, a lady, as a result of seeing the pictures, had an examination of her child and discovered that she already had a bad case of tuberculosis, and she attributes the discovery to the impression which the pictures made upon her.

The entire exhibition had the hearty indorsement of all the clergymen, physicians and authorities. Although I voluntarily stood the entire expense of the exhibition and charged no admission whatever, I feel that, aside from the certain benefits that it brought to the community, I was well repaid because of the favorable impression it made on a vast number of people, many of whom were never before very interested or favorably impressed with motion pictures. I have always endeavored to cater to the better class of patronage, and I believe that this exhibition has assisted a lot towards this end.

Yours very truly,

P. E. HAYES.

It is letters like this that give us encouragement, especially sometimes when we are downhearted and it seems to us that the business is going to the bow-wows. We are quite sure after reading his letter that Mr. Hayes is a man we would like to meet. We can tell from his letter that he is a gentleman of education, and we have no doubt that he is a credit to the business. It is easy to see also that he should be a more successful exhibitor than the one who antagonizes the school people, and who has an idea that ministers and school-teachers were put on earth for the sole purpose of giving him trouble.

The most encouraging sign of good understanding between the picture man and the school has emanated from a source which is the last one from which we would expect it. The letter following makes it plain that the exhibitor may not always have to knock at the school door for recognition, but that sometimes the school may come knocking at his door. It is a pleasure to reproduce this letter, written by the pupils of Public School No. 62, of 39 Suffolk Street, New York City, the largest school in the world, located directly in the heart of the lower East Side, whence one would least expect an educational movement of this kind to emanate. Before going further let us have the letter:

New York City, May 8th, 1911.
39 Suffolk Street

Manager of the Clinton Court Theater,
Clinton and Grand Streets.

Dear Sir—During this term we, the pupils of the Public School No. 62, take up "Julius Caesar." We hereby request you to put up these pictures.

We guarantee you that 90 per cent. of the pupils will be present at the performance. Kindly let the committee know when it is possible for you to have these pictures.

Thanking you in advance, we remain, yours respectfully,

THE COMMITTEE.

The people of the East Side do not look askance at the moving picture theatre; it is the one bright spot in their lives of tenement congestion and poverty. With them there is no matter of pride, and they openly come to the theatre manager, instead of waiting for him to come to them. This letter was written by the children themselves, but at the same time it is worthy of thanks that the teacher has allowed the letter to be written and sent.

More pleasing than this, however, is the attitude of Messrs. Markowitz & Brandt, managers of the Clinton Court Theatre, who forwarded the above letter to this office with a very nice letter, well written by apparently educated men, in which they state their interest in the matter and their intention of giving the school children exactly what they ask for in their unsolicited letter. The letter of the Clinton Court Theatre managers is fully appreciative of the necessity of being on good terms with the schools, and we quote in part from their letter: "It is our ambition to put the school-teachers and principals in such a position that they will cease their continuous dunning against moving picture theatres in general, and under this arrangement we think that the obligations we place upon them will cause them to be a little more lenient."

The above two letters are from widely separated parts. One is from what is supposed to be the most hopeless neighborhood in America, the lower East Side of New York City, where children play upon fire-escapes and in the streets, surrounded by poverty, sickness, drunkenness and crime. The other is from a pretty village up New York State where children play in the green fields and healthy air. Their lives are not defiled by poverty and want, and they have plenty of moral safeguard. In this connection, then, it is odd that it should remain for the school children of the lower East Side of New York City to be among the first to call for educational moving pictures, while it is necessary for an exhibitor in a clean home town like Malone, where everybody is supposed to be good, to carry his educational contribution to the door of the school and church.

Wanted: A Ruskin for the Moving Picture

The moving picture has had its Edison; what it needs now is its Ruskin. Had Ruskin lived to see the vogue and the possibilities of the moving picture, we would have had from him a moving picture gospel, not inferior in artistic and educational value to "Modern Painters" or "The Stones of Venice." We think there is much hope as well as inspiration for the moving picture journalist in the work of Ruskin. No man ever undertook a more arduous task and no man ever had a more hostile audience. Where the audience was not hostile, it was worse—indifferent. You have always a chance to convert the heretic, but the cynic is almost beyond hope. If in Ruskin's day a new Hercules had appeared and asked for new deeds worthy of his old classic achievement we should have told him, "Educate the British masses in matters of art," and feel sorry for the new Hercules. Ruskin accomplished the task and his methods and manners must be a guide to us, who seek to elevate the grade and character of moving pictures and to have the public help us in this work. Ruskin had a passionate, aggressive and uncompromising love for the light, for that light which is truth and beauty and goodness in one and whatever lived and throve in that light he loved and preached and taught, and whatever could not bear that light he cast into "endless shade."

He was the most patient and the most unselfish of teachers. Devoting his extraordinary talents, his great wealth and all the years of his life to the task of making his unreceptive countrymen appreciate the blessings which the Creator has stored away in art as well as in Nature, he neither asked nor expected any reward in the sense in which most of us use the word. At the end he was completely victorious and today his message is understood and welcomed in the depths of every soul not alone in England but wherever men and women realize the spiritual part of our being.

Mark well that it was to the workingman that Ruskin loved to address his message. Though his marvelous scholarship rendered him the peer of the best in all ages, though Oxford and other seats of learning made their demands to him irresistible, he loved best to talk to the plain people. That is why we believe he would have been a mighty warrior on behalf of the moving picture.

He should be an exemplar to us of the moving picture journalism in the enemies he made. Poor old England has not now and did not have in Ruskin's day our grand and glorious press with all its latest yellow improvements. With the certainty of a chemical reaction, however, all that was shallow and vulgar in the British Isles at once took alarm at Ruskin. The cheerless crowd of owls that hoots down any attempt to spread the light set up its dismal chorus and insisted that art was utterly beyond the masses and that a British workingman was having his constitutional rights violated by being drawn away from his tipple to such an unpractical thing as art. Then came the moralizing owls, who on the whole thought that art was a sort of subtle violation of every-day respectability and who could not possibly see any good in meddling with it. Ruskin took aim at these sombre birds of evil omen and with shafts of sarcasm that even the arsenal of Voltaire and Carlyle could not have furnished, not only brought them down, but stuffed them and took them around with him as horrible examples.

The journalistic representatives of the moving picture are to-day on the firing line. They must contend against the brutal lie, the wilful and unintentional ignorance, against the covert sneer and the base insinuation, of which the yellow press is full to overflowing. We must combat the narrow prejudice and open injustice of bench and pulpit. In this and in a hundred duties which the moving picture journal owes to the great art, which it seeks to vindicate, the example of the great John Ruskin will ever be a source of compelling inspiration.

Refinements Worth While

We Americans have often been accused of being, as a people, careless in our behavior and even lax in ordinary courtesy to one another. There is some ground for the accusation; but most of our bad conduct in this respect is on the surface and not in the heart. We are hurried and our shortcoming is due less to rudeness of disposition than to haste.

Are the manners shown in our best pictures worthy models, and do they truthfully reflect the usual conduct and manners of Americans? We believe they do; and should even venture to say that the players who make the best American pictures—oftentimes the least stagy ones—show more than ordinary culture. This is important, not so much because these pictures are sent abroad and represent us to other peoples, as because thousands and thousands of young people here at home see them constantly, and, consciously and unconsciously, take lessons in deportment from them. Yet even the producers of the best and most representative companies now and then, and some weeks pretty often, let some bit of truly bad manners creep into a good picture. Sometimes it happens in a love story, where it does the most harm. The writer recalls one particularly unfortunate occurrence; it happened a few weeks back in a romantic comedy of one of the most careful companies in the field. The scene was the sidewalk of a fashionable district of a city. The hero, who is smoking, meets the heroine and kisses her. As they meet he takes the cigarette from his mouth, and as he bends down he seems to blow the white smoke in her face. It was bad art also, for it was out of character and the writer claims that the cigarette was wholly out of place in such a scene. He would like to enquire how young ladies feel when their escorts are even walking with them on the street and smoking a cigarette. It isn't in the best form anyway. The story in which the incident took place was not of "swell" society, whose manners are notoriously bad, but of supposedly good society.

This morning the writer saw a scene pictured as taking place in a beautifully furnished room. There were ladies in the scene and a gentleman stood there with his hat on. Truly to point out such a thing as this is being critical. If all the pictures were up to the best there would be no need of doing it. Bad manners happen once in a while in a picture; they happen more than once in a while in life. But the pictures should be ideal in this matter; unintentional bad manners in a picture are very legitimate game for the critic. "It is the refinement of criticism," some one may say. "Very true," we can reply, "but remember good manners also are a refinement."

"Enoch Arden."

A Fine Two-Reel Visualization of Tennyson's Beautiful Poem.

Rivals for the love of one sweetheart, Enoch Arden triumps. As his fortune increases he seeks to better his fortunes, and sails for a foreign land.

"So these fell for two and parted as life's ascending sun Higher and higher rose on their one girl."

Shipwrecked, and the last of three survivors cast up on a lonely island, he is discovered after many years by sailors in search of water.

"An island rich, but the loneliest in a lonely sea."

In the MOVING PICTURE WORLD of June 3 will be found an analysis of the structure of the "Superior Play." More fitting illustrations to that article could not have been prepared than a selection from this masterly visualization of Tennyson's poem by the Biograph Company. The idea, the characterization and the situation are indeed very succinctly portrayed in the five scenes, which we are privileged to show herewith.

How many stories are there, either in prose or rhyme, to which allusion can be made before the average audience with the assurance of being understood? You may probably count them on the fingers of one hand. A popular classic is a precious possession, and in the treasury of English literature there is none more sure of immortality than "Enoch Arden." There are many reasons for this. One is the work of the poet. Tennyson was in love with his subject. The showy splendor of his style, his usual sweeping stateliness, the rhythmic and graceful cadence have given way to a simple, homely, yet most eloquent and sublime manner that approaches the epic of beauty of Homer. The highest charm, however, lies in the story itself. While we are all selfish in the concrete, we love without exception unselfishness in others. Therein we find the subtle and compelling spell of the poem. Most widely known and most deeply touching, it was small wonder that the subject early attracted the film-maker's attention. The Kalem Company four years ago treated the subject not altogether without success. Now the Biograph Company have turned to this rich mine and in two reels have done ample justice to the subject. The pictures were taken on the Pacific Coast, and in point of scenery and photography closely approach absolute perfection. The unfolding of the early part of the story, upon which after all everything depends, is accomplished with no mean degree of skill, and in less than five minutes the eyes of the spectator are riveted upon the screen, and Homeward bound, his fancy pictures a faithful wife and loved children still waiting and watching for his return.

"Smiled the voyage home, his fancy running on before the lazy wind."

She, faithful but hopeless after the years, yields to the entreaties of her former lover that her children need a father's care.

"Philip was the children's all in all;
They called him Father Philip."

Enoch Arden returns to find his wife and children happy with another and himself apparently forgotten. The surging emotions depicted in the face of the man that peers through the casement at the happy family and finally decides to hide himself away and never tell, is a marvel of facial expression—an apotheosis of the silent drama.

"He saw another, possessor of all this peace and warmth and happiness
A cold, bare, but not his .....
Oh, this is hard to bear.
Almighty God, blessed Savior, who didst uphold me on the rocky isle
Uphold me a while longer still!
Help, and me, never, never to tell, never to break in upon her happiness before half the reel is over the interest has grown to fascination. The contrast between the three principal characters, so finely developed in the poem, is with equal power brought out in the film, the early happiness of Enoch in wife and children, "the years of mutual love and honorable toil" are brought home to the audience in a most satisfying manner. The shipwreck of Arden and his companions, their fearful battle with the angry waves, their final landing in the agonies of mental and physical distress upon the shores of the isle, "rich, but the lonliest in a lonely sea," are genuinely realistic, and have probably never been equalled in moving pictures. Up to here the film follows the poem with marked fidelity, but just as the absorption of the audience is complete, the first reel comes to an end. It is to be greatly regretted that upon the first run the second reel cannot be seen by the audience until June 15th, three days after the release of the first reel, but this is a disadvantage which can, of course, be overcome later. The second reel skillfully picks up the thread and carries the story to its end. In the second reel, more so than in the first, the film-maker somewhat arbitrarily and with no apparent advantage departs from the story of Tennyson, but the great dramatic and heart rending moment of the tale is very happily seized by the Biograph artists, and no part of that soul-harrowing scene, which rarely fails to bring the drops of pity to the eye, is lost in the film. The Moving Picture World earnestly advises exhibitors to show both reels at the same performance, and to use in connection with them the lecture, which will be published for the use of exhibitors most probably in the next issue of this paper.

LECTURES FOR SUPERIOR PLAYS.

Another notable two-reel subject, "The Maccabees," is due for early release and for this we have also prepared a short lecture. Also for the single reel allegorical conception of "The Battle Hymn of the Republic." Viewing an advance copy of the latter we were impressed with its great possibilities if run slowly and accompanied by the soft tones of an organ, the effect, of course, would be heightened by a lecturer reciting the poem and explaining the symbolic scenes.

We urge upon the exhibitor to demand all two and three reel subjects together and to put them on with brief explanatory lectures. It is utter prodigacy for the exhibitor to treat many of the photoplays now being issued as daily changes. To get the full benefit of the advertising which a superior play gives a theater the play should be repeated if it cannot be run on successive nights. Many of these photoplays can be made doubly effective with a lecture. To help the exhibitor in obtaining the full benefit of the superior play, the Moving Picture World has engaged the services of W. Stephen Bush, a well-known lecturer and traveler, to prepare brief descriptive lectures on such subjects as warrant it, and these lectures will be published simultaneously in these pages with the release date of the films.

Settings

By Louis Reeves Harrison

There is art in setting a frame and the charm of a picture is enhanced by an appropriate frame, and one enjoyable part of a photoplay, contributing greatly to its whole value, is the environment in which characters play their parts. It can rise superior to that on the actual stage because things are seen in their true perspective and all nature contributes. The landscapes of Gaumont and of the Urgaiga company are delightful contributions to the effectiveness of their productions, many of them selected with such an expenditure of pains and good taste as to constitute rich additions to the world's store of art objects. Few directors have grand views at their immediate command, but, whenever and wherever they are obtainable, they are effective in certain scenes as backgrounds with an added worth of appealing loveliness in themselves. They glorify the pictorial drama, but should not be allowed to dominate the action or prevent the bold silhouetting of the characters at important moments. Exteriors and interiors alike must harmonize or contrast with the characters, as the case may be, for the sake of the story, but I am a great believer in the power of beauty of surroundings, and those who employ it successfully deserve to be called artists.

The environment of characters is called "atmosphere."

Where they live, move and have their being is a matter of importance as contributing to the general effect. Each nice little detail in its place adds, though it may not be noticed, and the tout ensemble is FELT by the audience. The play is thus toned by the atmosphere of joy or gloom as are the films by mechanical process. The photographic lights and shadows perform roles of their own, breathing the spirit of the pictured story.

One day while co-operating with an intelligent director in producing a photoplay, I was pleased to see him give his leading lady a chance to add a finishing touch to a scenic boudoir. Very politely he asked her to study the setting and make any suggestions she saw fit, at the same time intimating that the property room was at her disposal. The boudoir was attractive as it stood, but the leading lady's beauty-loving eyes found a bare spot. She came out of the prop room with a slender vase and a single rose. These so arranged with such instinctive good taste that the picture was complete, illustrating what has occurred to many in the audience—that women should be consulted in the matter of decorative principles as applied to the home. The director mentioned was broad enough in spirit to ask for discerning criticism and showed good sense in putting that offered to effective use. The main idea is to get results that count.

I have always thought it a great pity that present conditions make it difficult for author and director to work together, for the opening scenes are often part of the necessary preparation for what is to follow. They may even be prophetic, forecasting the action of the play; then, unless the playwright is something of an artist, he can give the director but faint idea of his imagined background within the brutal limitations of a scenario. Without interfering in the director's general scheme, the author of originality and imagination might often suggest a deft and well-considered touch that would aid in bringing out the fine points of the production.

The director has many problems to solve in the matter of proper scenic effect. In historical plays the period has to be studied; the season often imposes delay on prompt action; questions of light and shade must be considered; the duration of intervening time offers many pitfalls; on every hand there are opportunities for him to be guilty of inconsistency. Local color seems easy, but one has only to notice the amusing attempts of Frenchmen to catch the American spirit in order to realize how important is the part it plays in giving naturalness to the picture.

The French houses offend the better class of our people by making a continual and unnecessary display of the American flag. In New York there is a large foreign-born population, largely made up of people who left their native countries because of persecution, and from them the flag pictures elicit applause. The small boy occasionally thinks it his duty to applaud the flag but its misuse is not relished by intelligent Americans and is an obvious attempt to carry the play on sympathetic patriotism. Patriotism is rife among little fellows who have been crushed by big ones, but we are not in the business of destroying our neighbors and have proven over and over again that we can keep what we get by fighting for it. Having licked the noble red man or washed and educated him, having cleared the land of foreign armies of more than one nationality, and having settled our own disputes by the most terrible war the world has ever seen, we stand on reasonably sure ground, or think we do, and do not need any flag-flaunting to make us realize where we are at. Using the national emblem to force interest in a picture play is on a par with its employment to sell merchandise, a practise which has been suppressed by the United States Government. The use of the flag should be confined to occasions when it is or was in actual service.

There is a nice balance in the question of setting. It is too often inadequate, belittling the characters and movement, but it may err on the other side and overshadow interest in the picture story. It is as fatal to bury the drama under ponderous setting as to fall into the common error of giving attention to the situation at the expense of characterization.

It would be delightful to see some of the American home interiors made thoroughly representative of our national life. A professor in the Ecole de Beaux Arts, Paris, was one day shown some magnificent photographs of American residence interiors and after studying them for several days admitted that they surpassed anything he had ever seen in the palaces of Europe. While these might not be regarded as representatives of our democratic form of government, many of them being designed by French artists, it would be of live interest to foreign audiences if some examples of genuine American home interiors, very largely the creation of our cultivated women, could be reproduced or carefully imitated in our social dramas of modern times. It is a racial characteristic to promptly utilize information of value and we have more magazines devoted to questions of interior decoration than the rest of the world besides. Good taste is not confined to the homes of those whose wealth enables them to purchase sure examples of fine art, but is exhibited in all sections of the country and forms a part of the national character. Those who have travelled extensively abroad and at home realize that our women, more than those of any other nation, know how to blend comfort with correct decorative principles. It would be an object lesson to the people of other countries and a great pleasure to our own people if home interiors on the studio stage closely followed the best example of those in actual existence.

The thriller of the past week in the local animated picture field was the destruction by fire of the Powers Motion Picture Company's plant. Much sympathy is expressed for Mr. Powers and his associates, for while the loss is large and the plant was reduced to total ruin, neither element weighs upon the sufferers as heavily as the getting and pulling together again to achieve the smoothness and perfection that years of labor has brought about. The last big fire in the moving picture field in this city preceding that which destroyed the Powers plant was that which almost completely wiped out the American Vitagraph film renting exchange. The loss by reason of the latter fire was not twenty-five per cent of that claimed by the Powers people, but, believe me, it was some fire. It was more continued, and therefore more of a roaster. Hundreds of reels of films were destroyed, but they had earned their cost. In the Powers case, the film destroyed represented either newly completed pictures that had not been released, or stock that had not been passed through the camera. The Powers Company feels its loss keenly, but judging from the manner in which they have taken hold of the situation, I look for an early appearance of the "Phœnix-like we rise" ads.

Since the publication of my last letter, a number of communications have found their way to my desk asking why I did not furnish the names of the film exchanges and the operators complained of. I have but one answer to make. No good purpose could be gained by it. The complaints I referred to have been so general that no one could question their justification. If it had been intended to place certain exchanges or operators at a disadvantage, the publication of the names of the places and individuals would have been in order; but such was not the purpose. I gave full space to the charges for the sole purpose of warning those to whom they properly applied, and if they did not heed they must abide the consequences, for, like the worm, the exhibitors will turn at some time. Since the charges have been made public several exhibitors have told me that the people I interviewed had not made their stories strong enough. One man has told me that he has gone to his exchange several times and got this in response to his protestations. "Wattell yer kicking about. Dere's yer program. If yer don't like it leave it alone and gettell out of here."

This version may be a little far fetched, but some exhibitors tell very astounding stories about the apparent disregard of some exchanges for what is called business policy.

But what gets my goat is a letter from some person who declares that in my statements regarding certain operators, last week I attempted to discredit the operators' union. Only an ignoramus could so construe any of the statements made. The complaints I mentioned were bona fide, and I know every loyal union man would be only too willing to squelch operators of the kind I have referred to.

The open air places in New York and the vicinity have certainly been up against it the past week. Rain and cool weather have curtailed the box office receipts to a very unpleasant degree. As I stood near an entrance to one of the open air places one night I overheard this:

Manager—"Gee! If the weather doesn't change soon I'd have to vacate this lot."

Bystander—"What's the matter?"

Manager—"Matter! Why, this rain and bunch of chills."

Bystander—"My dear man, don't you know the farmers have been praying for rain for many weeks? Don't you know that farmers need rain for good crops, and when crops are good money is plentiful?"

Manager—"I an that! I can that! There isn't a farm within twelve miles of this place, and even if there were, I couldn't afford to wait until the crops are harvested, because by that time people are beginning to think of getting into winter quarters again."

A writer commenting upon the introduction of moving pictures in Madison Square Garden says millions of dollars are being coupled, in common parlance, with moving pictures, and there is every reason to feel that pictures are rapidly passing from the infancy stage to one of established stability. Well, I should say they are. There is a picture house in Brooklyn that is the first of a circuit of houses to be established by a syndicate of Wall Street people. Pictures and a vaudeville constitute the program, and it is some house. Think of it! Wall Street going into the moving picture business! Truly, financiers are not only good business men but keen observers of human nature.

I heard a man say yesterday that had moving pictures been advertised through the daily press on the same scale as other amusements years ago the popularity they now enjoy would have come to them in less than one-half the time. I do not entirely agree with this argument. I believe that well-placed advertising pays, and brings results quickly, but the pictures are an exception to the rule. Ten years ago we did not have the pictures we have today, nor was there a one-hundredth part of the money invested in them that there is at the present time. They were principally used at that time to wind up vaudeville programs and were given scant, if any, mention in the press notices. Features were scarce, photography somewhat ragged, and the characters in stories portrayed mainly by amateurs. The newspapers were the first to see the future for pictures, but declined to confess it because the picture men were not inclined to come toward with advertisements. Then the newspapers commenced to knock and ridicule, but the perfection of the pictures went steadily on until the public was forced to give them attention by reason of their merits. The pictures achieved their wonderful success without the assistance of the newspapers, and I am inclined to believe that had that success been brought in earlier by means of newspaper advertising and booming it would not have been of the substantial character attached to the existing success, but would have soon taken a reverse movement. My reason for this is that while has been spoke the improvement and perfection of the pictures could not have equaled the permanent popularity now attained in exception to newspaper advertisements.

The dearth of comedy is again, or rather, still, the cry. There is a reason. Scenario writers are overlooking, but they are of the assertive temperament. People who are capable of contributing comedy are but few in proportion. It is said the world is full of funny people, but those who can be real funny are scarce. Why do none of the rib-tickling writers jump into the field? There is no money awaiting them. Good comedies can command good prices. Only genuinely funny situations are wanted—the brain need not be racked for laugh-provoking dialogue and actions. If looks simple enough, why don't some comedy to do so look? Where are you, Mayer, Fawcett?

Present indications point to the keeping open of some indoor picture shows during the coming summer, as are other summer in the history of moving pictures. The more modern houses have been built to the buttons all the way and the owners of the older places appear to have resolved to make a fight, although they have not any unusually valuable air draws. A few genuine ice-boxes are in almost general showing as each places arise among the fifteenth of June. The change has been brought about in some extent by the increase of suits required by the municipal departments, which have materially improved the facilities for ventilation.

Two more picture theaters in Chicago have inaugurated a system for charging tables so that the patrons may personally enjoy the pictures. It may work all right in Chicago, but never in Brooklyn. Where could all the baby carriages be stored? Build a garage in the basement. Bah!

The Passing Show.

C. H. Claudy.

Recently in these columns was borne pertinent comment on the misuse of comedy and straightaway I rose into all kinds of ambitious criticisms. There are many varieties, and those I have more mainly on the latter kind.

Why is it anyone that a really good comedy is as rare as a comedian? Why is it that those the gods know real comedy into farce and from farce to slap-stick, and from slap-stick to absolute nonsense the comedy gets more and more common until when you get as low as Mas or Emils-land you can find all you want and more.

But while one can point the finger of ridicule at several alleged comic efforts which have bored moving picture audiences during the past ten days, one can also find ground for hope for Vitagraph has come to the rescue with a genuinely funny comedy, which does not depend upon the usual farce situations for its humor. No, it isn't a new plot—a girl misrepresenting as a man is an idea as old as drama itself—but Vitagraph has provided a fresh setting and done the work daintily and Miss Turner has merited a gold medal and a pension for her old age, by the extremely clever work she does as the boy in "A Clever Friend."

It is simple enough. Aunt Celia's nephew, in love with young actress. Aunt Celia says "No"—must marry girl who picks out, it want to inherit money. Consternation. Nephew invited, with friends to house party—dance. Actress decides to go, as a boy. Newsy takes her. She makes a handsome boy, and all the girls are crazy about "him," to the exclusion of all the rest of the boys.

Now, just a minute, please. Right here is where the whole thing ought to have failed and fallen as flat as a pancake. In nine cases out of ten when this stunt is pulled off, the girl, dressed in boys' clothes looks about as much like a boy as she would if she wore tights on the stage and carried a spear and was labeled "Fierce Warrior."

In other words, she usually looks like a girl, moves like a girl, has a waist like a girl, walks like a girl and wouldn't deceive any one but a brother or sister moving picture actor or actress. But Miss Turner turns herself into a very respectable imitation of a young man—she manages to look natural as a young man and act naturally, into the bargain, so there is no reason to wonder why all the rest of the people on the stage fail to see in the good looking lad the femininity the audience knows is there.

Naturally, the boys at the dance resent this beardless youth's success with all the girls. So they plan to haze "him" a bit, and "he" terrified, takes refuge in the girl's room. They are in turn, terrified, but one, braver than the rest, upbraids "him" for "his" daring in coming to their room, whereupon "he" confesses his sex with a swift doffing of "his" wig. The expressions of these four girls, who have been so taken with the "lad," when they find him a girl, would make a graven image laugh—and the audience is not composed of graven images. The playlet works out naturally, with some fun which the girls have with the boys by stealing the guardian boy's clothes with pillows and putting the made-up man to bed for them to haze, and Aunt Celia capitulates in the end.

The joy of this comedy is not the plot, which is nothing remarkable, but the careful, painstaking and elaborate way it was carried out and the unusually good imitation of a boy given by Miss Turner, and the play of expression on the faces of the girls.

Much more on the order of farce, is "The Infant at Shakeville" in which Essanay portrays the tribulations of a lot of cowboys left with an infant on their hands, and their desire to please it, sing to it, feed it, put it to sleep, etc. One states with reluctance after seeing how hard every one works to be funny, that the moments of real humor here are few and far between. Of course, the spectacle of a fat woman running six or ten miles after her baby is highly funny—especially when some dirt on her clothes shows how she fell down. But—I can hardly stop laughing—not! Her six men, even cowboys, would think one baby wanted a couple of gallons of milk, seems, to put it mildly, somewhat overdrawn and that the six should so fight over the feeding as to upset most of it all on the baby is even less probable. However, one must not criticise a broad farce too much for being unnatural, only, when a farce isn't funny enough to make people laugh, why make the farce at all? I heard several women commenting on the film, and the burden of their comment was "Oh, that poor little baby—look at it cry! I think it's a shame to make it so unhappy just for the old picture—etc." And I confess to regret for the tears and joy that it wasn't my little one who was being so badly treated. Of course, he wasn't being hurt. But he was too little to understand, and his plaintive little face all screwed up into a "good cry" was not so hewingly funny that I had to stuff my handkerchief in my mouth to keep the noise drown, and when he turned his little head and wailed out "Mamma!"—which you could "read" very easily—I was not the only one in the audience who had had enough.

Now, "Alkali Ike's Auto," while slap-sticky enough, was a great success, and Essanay is respectfully advised to give us an other as good. The same fat lady who ran miles here, and the same very clever comedian cowboy were principals in this little laugh, and while we may have felt sorry for Her Fatness in her troubles with the auto which ran away, the audience didn't get so teary it forgot to laugh right straight through—which is, after all, the ultimate test of whether anything is funny or not.

"Bertie's Reformation" (Kalem) is one of those pitiful comedies in which you keep wondering where the laugh comes in. It isn't funny, because it simply isn't true—or possible—or even probable. We who go to motion picture theaters want to see people we know, or understand, or believe in, as characters. Girls who are so crazy as to marry young men who don't even know them, that they willingly accede to papa's suggestion that they join the chorus of a Broadway show to make Bertie fall in love with them and so give up their "White Lights" career don't appeal as being the kind of girls we know—or want to know. Of course, Bertie promptly falls in love with the new chorus girl—so the play can proceed. No, we don't blame Bertie, for she is a very pretty chorus girl. But we wonder whether it would have worked out so well in real life, and we also wonder where the girl's father and mother were and what they had to say about her going in the chorus to win Bertie, and why she was permitted to go and live alone in the boarding house where Bertie called—Oh, we wonder a lot of things. Maybe that's why we didn't shriek with laughter—because we wondered so much.

Now, chorus girls can be part of a comedy and not make us think it's a serious drama, as Edison's "Nice" and the "Chorus Lady" proved. Of course, this is only refined farce—in which mother-in-law and an awkward visitor are made to fall upon one another's necks by introducing Awkward Visitor as Niece. This isn't new, either, but it worked out very well on the screen, and we didn't have to keep wondering where the laugh was coming in—it came in rather frequently and very heartily, which is more than can be said for Kalem's Bertie.

Biograph's "Dutch Gold Mine" disappointed me. It could have been so much funnier with a little effort. The plot, in which a Dutch bar keeper in a mining camp gets even with his tormentors by first buying their horses, by proxy, then making them wild to buy them back again by making them think he has received news of a gold mine some distance off, was plenty good enough to raise a laugh or so. But Dutchy didn't come up to the mark at all—he was too evidently a "made-to-order Dutchman" and he wrote his signs in broken Dutch English, but he forged the letter to himself in good English, and made a few other little slips like that which told us all, too plainly, that he wasn't really a clever, cowardly, anxious German, but a too vehement actor who hadn't studied his part enough!

But if the lack of good comedy has born out the plaint in these columns mentioned, there have been some bright spots in drama as well as some rather sensational films (good to write about if not to see) within the same time.

Pathe's "His Baby's Doll" strikes me as one of the best things the American Pathe Company has done for Lo, these many moons. Spite of some small faults, more of interpretation than construction, this effort seems to me to rank high. It concerns a father, whose little girl is killed, and who goes insane, becoming a passionate lover of her doll, and, in fact all the dolls he can find.

His wife gets the idea (and this is an unnecessary unnaturalness, for the idea might more logically and just as easily been that of the neurologist) that if he is introduced to several dolls, all dressed alike, and each one larger than the other, and the last big one is taken away and a girl, who looks something like his dead daughter, and dressed like the dolls, be presented to him, he may, in the surprise of having her speak to him and touch him, recover his reason. This is done—and the several dolls, all dressed alike, and the little girl, also dressed like the dolls, play their appointed parts with a good deal of naturalness, especially the girl. The film grips and holds the attention. It's not specially agreeable to see a child killed and watch her death struggle, nor to see wild grief on the mimic stage, nor to see a man go crazy. But it was all so well done that it convinced—for ever' even if we shuddered, at it. Had the insane asylum scene been less overdrawn, and the doctor supplied with the first rudiments of his profession, the production film would have been almost impossible to criticise. No doctor of any sense at all would permit a crazy man to make an exhibition of himself in front of his grief stricken wife before his child's body was even cold—that going crazy scene reminded one a little too much of a stage, an actor, and a lot of audience grouped round to watch him, to be wholly natural.

Gaumont furnishes "Mistrust," a drama built on an anonymous letter sent in revenge by a poacher, to a game warden. The game warden is warned to look after his wife, as she needs it, and the seeds of suspicion grow speedily in his mind and nearly result in a tragedy when he shoots through the walls of a little hut, thinking his wife and a paramour are there, when it is only his own children. The little ones are not hurt, the wife returns from a neighbor's, whither she had gone to assist in nursing, and the reunited family are happy once more.

The convincing pictures of a worried husband, and that of a loving and mystified wife, given by the two principals of this little play, were most excellent. The photography was, as is usually the case with Gaumont, beautiful. One questions the interiors of the houses, and their exteriors, too, for that matter, as being somewhat elaborate for game keepers, their wives and friends, but I cannot make any very definite accusation of infidelity to detail, never having seen the exterior of a French game warden's home, or its interior, either.

But the play, the actors, and the children were all good, any way!

Selig, it seems to me, got a little over-ambitious in the "Rose of Old St. Augustine." The photography was hardly Selig quality, and one looks first for fine technic in Selig films—at least I do. There was a little touch of modernity in the ships and fittings, which fitted ill with the idea of pirate ships of olden time, and the plank walking scene at the last, which might have made a strong and not easily forgotten picture was so hurried over and so blurred with cordage and crowded shipping as to spell "wasted opportunity" in capital letters. But I was crazy about the Rose, herself, and her acting.

Thanhouser's "War Time Wooing" was distinctively good. It was probably more the stars and stripes than the plot, but the audience cheered several times through this Cuban war play, in which unusually excellent photography set off a plot which had some novel angles. But these war plays present so many places for going wrong, it's a wonder producers will fool with them—or that, if they will fool with them, that they won't study them. Edison's "Hearts and Flags" was a very pretty play—but, Great Caesar's Ghost! Who ever heard of any officer, let alone one in love with a young woman, and one who had been nursed by her, striding all round her house with his hat on? The scene in the hall of the old mansion when the drunken soldiers break in, was very unnatural—the girls clung wildly to the banisters, but made no effort to get out of the way, and a general air of "poseduress" pervaded it. When you add to all this a horse which has been so tearfully lathered with a shaving brush that the marks are still there—it is to laugh! Yet the play, as a whole, was good.

Pathe's "Flag Didn't Raise" is so bad it ought not to be mentioned at all—principally because the plot isn't clear. We don't know anything about any of it until it's over—and then we don't know!

Two officers love one girl. She loves one. Villain plans revenge on successful rival. Steals a paper from dispatch box, secrets in rival's coat. Rival accused, condemned to be shot. Villain gets hurt in battle. Girl nurses him. Villain confesses. Girl rides to save man she loves.

Now, we don't know why the villain confesses. We don't know how the girl knows her lover is to be shot. We refuse to believe that any officer in charge of an execution would refuse to stay it if a handsome girl came and threw herself on his neck and waived a confession of guilt by the real criminal in front of his nose. But there just had to be a flag in this play to fit the title, so she wraps her lover in the flag and hard-hearted officer tears it off, and not until General Somebody arrives with another flag is the execution definitely postponed—and where the flag was to rise, and why it couldn't raise and what it's all about anyway is more than most people know.

Oh, well, the lot of a critic is a thankless one—he is hard to please and dissatisfied with everything anyway, so Pathe needn't lose any sleep over my fulminations. Yet I would that someone would give us some more really fine war plays—as fine as Kalem used to give us a year ago, than which no better have ever been produced on this side of the ocean that I have ever seen.

And now—did I hear some one say "Praise be?"—no more until next time!

A Moving Picture Catechism

For the use and benefit of enlightened and progressive exhibitors the Moving Picture World prints this present catechism. It will be found an effective weapon in the campaign of illumination, which must still be carried on against wilful misrepresentation and persistent ignorance. Every intelligent exhibitor will be glad to bear his share in this campaign of publicity on behalf of the great and noble art. The distribution of such a catechism among the patrons is bound to result in immediate and lasting good. Do not let the other side, "the devil's advocate," use all the printers' ink.

CATECHISM.

Q. What is a moving picture?

A. A modern invention enabling the public to see at small cost a true and perfect representation of man and his world in all possible moods and aspects.

Q. What is the object of the moving picture?

A. To amuse, to entertain, to instruct, to teach the mind and touch the heart, to hold the mirror up to nature and to man.

Q. What is the influence of the moving picture?

A. As it affects daily, more human beings than church, library, school and theater combined, its influence is one of the greatest in modern life.

Q. Is this influence exerted for good or evil?

A. Wholly for good, subject only to the imperfections and limitations of human nature. The quality of the pictures is steadily improving, educational features are on the increase, the tone and general atmosphere of moving picture theaters are clean and healthy.

Q. Who controls the morals of the moving picture?

A. The greatest court in the world, from which there is no appeal—THE PUBLIC.

Q. Does the moving picture depict crime?

A. The moving picture does not depict crime. A complete and true portrayal of life without showing its grosser follies and weaknesses is impossible, but the moving picture only takes notice of the darker side of life as an incident and devotes far less space to it than the daily press, the Bible or Shakespeare.

Q. What will be the future of the moving picture?

A. Its friends believe it is destined to become the people's university, as it has long since become the people's theater. It will have the best and largest theaters for its homes, it will attract the greatest artists of the world's stage, plays will be supplied by the highest type of playwrights, it will be an unequalled aid to the children in their studies, knowledge in all departments of learning, especially in natural history, chemistry, medicine and surgery.

Q. What should be your attitude toward the moving picture?

A. One of friendly criticism. The moving picture invites popular comment and criticism, it depends for its existence and prosperity on the people; it asks you to come to entertain and to express your opinion as an interested one, which the management will ever be grateful.

Eldorado, Ill.—Mr. T. O. Thomas, of Mt. Carmel, Ill., has purchased of Mr. S. M. Farrer the Casino Theatre and Vaudeville House, having sold his former theatre at Mt. Carmel, Ill., to Mr. A. Pagels, of that city. The Casino will show three reels of independent pictures and one act of vaudeville for an admission of ten cents. The house seats 800 and is playing to good business, with future prospects very bright. The acts are booked by the Webber Agency, of St. Louis, Mo.

Powers Plant DestrOyed By Fire.

For one week prior to the opening of the present season, there was but a few days in which there was not a fire, explosion or accident of some kind reported in the daily papers. With all the talk about the extreme inflammability of celluloid, it has remained until this late day for anything of the nature of a serious fire to occur. The cause in the case in point other than has been the cause of fires before in other cases of the same, namely, an electric light being placed upon something that was combustible.

On the afternoon of June 26th, the plant of the Powers' Company, makers of the Powers' Picture Plays, located at 127-131 West 21st Street and Fifteenth Avenue, New York city, was totally destroyed by fire. Very little was saved and much of value was lost. The fire occurred, very oddly, on the heels of a favorable court decision for Mr. Powers, and came rather ironically while Mr Powers was in the midst of congratulations and celebration over his victory in the courts, which of course, were at once changed to words and messages of sympathy.

It is unfortunate that this fire should have happened just as the insurance autocrats were beginning to quiet down and behave themselves. It is very probable that from now on rates will again be made prohibitive and will thus effect all those engaged in the making of moving pictures. This may be expected in spite of the fact that there was no insurance carried on the Powers' plant.

The Powers studio and laboratory, as the accompanying cut will show, were located in a highly inflammable building. When the fire started it proved to be nothing but a tinder box. Thirty minutes from the time the fire started everything was burned down to the ground. All of the hundred employees escaped in plenty of time. Some of them rendered heroic aid in what they could in the way of saving property, but the fire increased so rapidly that scarcely anything was saved.

The fire began in the polishing room, and was started by a hanging electric light bulb, which was allowed to rest directly against a reel of fresh celluloid film. The day was rainy and dark, and one of the polishing girls in order to see her work better lowered the light on the drop cord in such a way that it hung against this reel of film, which was on one of shelves containing many other new prints. The moment goes to show that if managers of film factories were to make a strict rule that all incandescent bulbs, that are carried anywhere around a film room, should be surrounded by a wire basket. Any sane person should know that an electric light bulb that is capable of blistering one's hand in a few moments, has enough heat in it to set fire to a film to no great length of time.

Three engines were turned in, but the plant was practically destroyed by the time the third battalion of fire apparatus arrived. The reason the fire spread so quickly was due to the extremely large quantity of raw film stock in storage at the time. At the time the fire broke out there was a large production on entitled "The Embassy Ball," in which the entire cast was engaged in a large ballroom scene calling for many national costumes. The costumes were saved, but the actors were obliged to leave their street clothes and parasols to the mercy of the flames.

It must be true that photographers are born and not made. The test of a genuine photographer is the way he conducts himself during crucial moments. If the camera man loses his wits, he is not a photographer. If he keeps a cool head on his shoulders in the midst of a panic and comes out with a good negative, then by all precedent he is entitled to recognition as a worthy member of the photographic guild. The conduct of Mr. A. H. Leach, chief camera man of the Powers Company, is worthy of note in commenting upon the fire. Unlike most of the employees, who became rattled and ran helter-skelter about, Mr. Leach perceived at all the element a "big moment," which in film and stage parlance means the highest tension of human emotion, sometimes known as a climax. Immediately when the fire broke out, instead of running away, he took his camera away from the deserted stage and focused it upon the burning building, using his best judgment in selecting what, to his mind, could be used best as a thrilling fire scene in a well-written drama which will no doubt appear in the near future bearing the label of "Powers' Picture Plays." Needless to say, that the trade will await this reel with much interest.

P. A. Powers.

It is due to the presence of mind and quick action of Mr. Thomas Evans, manager of the Powers plant, that most of the negatives were saved. Under his direction the large omnibus automobile was backed out of the building by hand power and at once filled with all but a few of the negatives. The only lost negatives of any great importance were the Buffalo Bill and Pawnee Bill Moving Picture Company, and a splendid negative of the Panama Canal. The loss of the latter negative is particularly lamentable, as no more photographs can be taken of the Panama Canal, owing to the fact that President Taft has recently issued an order forbidding all photographers making negatives there. The negatives of all the regular releases of the Powers Picture Plays were saved except the one that was in the printing room at the time the fire broke out. By reason of good business management, it happens that all the printed Powers releases for the coming three weeks had already been delivered to the Sales Company, therefore there will be absolutely no delay or hitch in the Powers end of the regular weekly Independent programme, except for the possible substitution of another release for one of those which has been advertised.

There had just been delivered to the Powers Company a shipment of fine special posters from the Courier Lithograph Company, of Buffalo. These posters of Nat Wills in "The King of Kazam" were from drawings by the famous artist "Pal" and were worth 25 cents each at cost. Five thousand of them were destroyed. However, the negatives of Nat Wills in the comedy picture "The King of Kazam" were saved, with the exception of one scene, which will be retaken.

While Tommy Evans was making a hero of himself in the factory, Miss Rose Wells was playing the "she-ro" in the office department. The boy that stood on the burning deck was backed off the boards by the presence of mind of this young woman, who stood at her post of duty until the flames were at her back before she jumped from the window with a typewriter in one hand and an open umbrella in the other. After all the other girls in the offices had fled, she held off the approaching fire by closing the office door and began putting things into the safe. The more valuable books she hurled out of the window into the hands of some of the office force. While she was doing this the mother of one of the office girls arrived on the scene and thinking that Miss Wells was her daughter, wrung her hands and sank to her knees crying, "Fireman, save my child!" In the illustration Miss Wells may be seen in the window of the office.

There will be absolutely no delay in the Powers' product. Were it not for newspaper notices, the exhibitor would not be aware that any fire had taken place, so far as deliveries will be concerned. The company at the Richardson Avenue plant which was burned Monday afternoon was ordered to report to the Powers' studio at Whitestone, L. I., on Tuesday morning, where under the direction of producers Rhymus and Beal work had been going on ever since as though nothing had happened.

In order to show the good will that exists among the members of the Sales Company it is well to say at this point that every one of the Independent producers located in New York City immediately offered Mr. Powers the use of their studios and volunteered him any assistance possible that they could render to get him running again. Many messages of sympathy were received by Mr. Powers from every part of the United States, as well as from Canada and Europe. Mr. Powers is very grateful for these kind sentiments, but being too busy at the present time to make personal response, he has requested the World to express to its readers in these columns his deep appreciation of such kind sentiments, which he will never be able to forget. It was not necessary for Mr. Powers to avail himself of the spontaneous generosity of the New York manufacturers, but their kind offer of assistance carries none the less weight with him on that account.

Messrs. Powers & Beal have seen two of the busiest men in New York City most since the fire, actually stopping to eat or sleep. Telegrams by the hundreds have gone forth to reassure all those dependent upon Powers' product, and temporary arangements of many kinds are conserving their time. For a brief interval, we managed to secure an interview with Mr. Powers. He is one of the best losers we ever saw. He takes the matter philosophically. His explanation why he carried no insurance is a characteristic argument. He never could see the use in paying insurance people 10 per cent of the value of his plant, when the building would have burned just as quickly had it been used as a training stable, as it previously had been, and was filled with inflammable hay. However, it is time for the Phoenix hard to get on the job again. Out of the ashes of the old Powers' outfit will rise a fine new modern studio equipped with every facility that money can buy and the equal of any moving picture plant now in existence. Plans are already being drawn for the new establishment, which Mr. Powers assured us will be built of concrete and fireproof material and will represent an investment of at least $100,000.

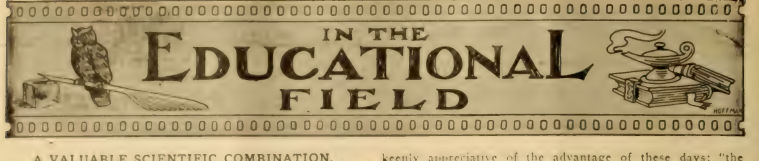
For The Squaw (Pathe).

In one respect this film differs to great advantage from many Indian stories in moving pictures. It depends for its success on the conveying to the spectator of an idea and a moral. A white man, his fourth pleaded to a white woman, goes West to seek his fortune. He succeeds in his mining venture, but before returning East, feeling the need of a female companion, bargains with an Indian for the hand of his daughter. After the fashion of her people, she is sold to the white man and becomes in everything to him but name the white man's wife. Two years elapse, a child has been born to the couple. In her own way and in her own heart, the Indian girl has been a loyal helpmate. The white man, however, has tired of her and of life in the wilderness and his thoughts go back to the white sweethearts in the East. A letter comes to the cabin where they live telling of the death of the white girl's parents and her resolution to come West and join the husband to be. The letter gets into the hands of the Indian girl. Her father learns of the contents and decides to intercept the white woman. He succeeds and explains all to her, appealing to her to leave. The white man, not knowing that his intended bride has passed the trail, rushes to the rescued section and hurriedly procures a minister to perform the marriage ceremony while the Indian girl with her child and father and mother appears on the scene. The white woman is thrilled at the perfidiousness of the white man; she recognizes the rights of her real sister and sometimes the white man of her own race is reason loyal to his family in the wilderness. A compromise train carries her away and leaves the white man and the Indian girl reunited to the situation. The dramatic interest is great, the players capable, especially the one representing the Indian girl. Here and there the film shows unfortunate marks of haste and there is a noticeable inconsistency in the matter of length of scenes. The may seem hypercritical, but in Pathe films one expects a very close approximation to absolute correctness. The photography is beyond all praise.



A VALUABLE SCIENTIFIC COMBINATION.

The blending of the two great achievements of modern science, the airship and the cinematograph, seems to suggest the timely coming together of these wonders, for the purpose of proving the necessity each would otherwise have felt for the other.

The aircraft, whether the dirigible balloon or the aeroplane, without the cinematograph, would be like the eye without the memory. The cinematograph without the aircraft would be as useless for aerial purposes as the eagle eye without wings. Together, they combine nature, science and art in producing the most beneficial, yet beautifying, and to an educated civilization.

The scope and grandeur made possible by this combination will open a new range of subjects of most absorbing interest. The voyage over Lucerne is so wonderful and inspiring that before long we shall have a series of pictures entitled:

The Earth from the Skies.

As this is not a scientific paper, it is not proper to dwell upon the many valuable features with which the world is going to be favored by these new advantages. From the standpoint of the educating and beautifying pictures, such reproductions as the voyage over Lucerne will prove of great value, also of most intensely pleasing interest. The pictures in this series are taken both of the airship and from the airship. Those of the airship show the majectic rise, progress and descent of this monster voyager among the clouds. Those from the airship display the marvelous panorama of the city and lake of Lucerne, with the beautiful surrounding country in a most thrilling series of pictures. The frequenter of the moving picture is familiar with the sensations and views experienced when sitting before the picture taken from a railroad train, or other moving conveyance. In like manner, while looking over Lucerne, one feels as if already borne aloft above the clouds; the very swaying of the balloon being so noticeable that the usual remarkable reality is experienced. The vista is beyond description; a new and entrancing beauty holds the beholder; former views of a piece of beautiful landscape fade into insignificance before this vast and almost boundless picture of a portion of the earth's garden. For knowledge and beauty, cinematography has produced nothing superior to the inspiring views taken, and possible, from above the surface of the earth.

FIVE YEARS IN ONE.

A magazine editor suggests: "It would be an interesting experiment if a dozen children could be taught by means of moving pictures all the school branches of geography, history, botany, astronomy and the classics; and, at the end of about one year, to compare these children's education with that of a dozen similar children, who had been five years learning all this in the schools."

Of course, we do not know if the editor referred to above reads this page. If so, he is really presenting some of our suggested possibilities in a new light; if he does not read these notes, he is a profitable example of the fact (not that great minds think alike) that kindred minds, having kindred aspirations express themselves in kindred hopes.

Less than half a century ago, thirty years was considered the "generation of a change." In these days of progress and accumulation, ten years suffice for such a "change" or "generation." Under these circumstances, it is no carelessness of speech or calculation to suggest that cinematography may be instrumental in reducing, by combined concentrations, the power of five years' school study, along lines within its scope, to the short perid of one year. May we venture the hope that the magazine referred to may help us in our endeavor to stimulate public taste to that point where it shall appreciate and demand this great benefit for the rising generation? It appears only too true that "the world is slow to recognize the possibilities of moving pictures." We doubt, however, whether people of former times would have been more keenly appreciative of the advantage of these days; "the world," so-called, moves slowly; the leaders must necessarily be in advance, and, as a result of a test recently made by the writer, he trusts soon to be able to show that the most ambitious desires will be given an opportunity to test the possibility of their fulfilment.

THE PICTURES AND A CRIME.

While this page is set apart for educational purposes it will be conceded that truth (even upon sociological questions in the abstract) is in place here when it has to do with the interest of moving pictures and is also of educational value. The peculiar and lamentable circumstances surrounding the strange case of juvenile criminality as revealed in the murder of a boy of tender years by one of his four companions (all under 15 years old) in New York City this week has caused widespread wonder and discussion.

The apology for considering this crime in this place, is found in the fact that the coroner, displaying more zeal than wisdom, and trying to outrank the police or even society in fixing a cause for so terrible an effect, blames the "moving picture."

A few weeks ago there appeared in the Moving Picture World a sociological article entitled "The Moving Picture Revealing Social Conditions." Sad though it may be, this juvenile murder has proved in every detail the truth of the statements therein made; it is possible to go still further and state that the true conditions are actually worse than stated at that time.

The only connection between the tragedy and the moving pictures is that the boys had several times been to the "moving picture show." Further than this there is nothing to show that they had become subject to any evil influences there; the confession of the most guilty of the quintet does not include any prejudicial reference to the "show." Let us now look at the "social conditions revealed." The murdered boy stole $20 from his mother and joined the other boys for a "good time." Although away from his home for several days, his mother made no serious attempt to find him. When, however, she missed her money she made such a hue and cry that it led to the discovery of the missing boy. The boy guilty of the crime (accidental or otherwise) had been left at home with a younger brother to live alone, while his mother went West on a necessary errand.

What more natural than finding one of their associates with twenty dollars, several of them should live together with the two boys so wickedly left alone and have a New York street-boy's good time.

Criminal negligence is a small name for the parental neglect; the parents actually pushed these boys in the way of evil living; indeed it would have been a surprise and a wonder if no evil results had not followed such incompetent parentage and such vile surroundings.

Again, the ease with which minors can purchase deadly weapons is disgraceful, for it is a well known fact that boys and youths of this class covet the possession of a revolver more than almost any other article. The whole unsavory circumstances are a true revelation of social conditions common where these boys lived. It is therefore a slander upon the moving pictures to lay even one iota of blame upon them, because these particular boys did as all boys do, good and bad, i. e., go to the moving picture show.

If the parents of these boys had gone with them to the moving pictures results might have been very different, because, taken as a whole, the moving pictures are intended to elevate and not degrade.

The sad and blameable conditions which caused this deplorable tragedy are easily found in parental neglect, vicious surroundings and permitted juvenile delinquency. The ambition of educational moving pictures is intended as much as anything to combat social evils, such as those shown in existence here, and as a coroner's duty is to place the blame where it belongs, it is to be hoped that a premature reference to an improbable cause will not again be made.

Temptations of a Great City.

A Special Release That Has Been Successful in Europe.

We were favored with an advance view this week of a three-reel subject, produced by the Great Northern Company, of Denmark, entitled "The Temptations of a Great City." The American rights for this excellent picture have been secured by Mr. P. P. Craft, of the Buffalo Bill and Pawnee Bill Film Company. The picture is one of the best-acted films that it has ever been our pleasure to witness.

To those of our readers who remember that excellent Pathe picture, "The Hand," we would say that this Danish picture is on a par with that sterling little drama of some three years ago, which was acted by three persons in a way that has probably never been surpassed. The entire three reels of "The Temptations of a Great City" are acted by four strong characters, with no other characters, except an occasional lackey or policeman. The part of the waiter, who is also a money-lender to the gilded youth whom he serves, is really a masterpiece of character work.

"The Temptations of a Great City" is melodrama, pure and simple. It does not claim to be anything else. It can be called high-class melodrama. In it there are no shooting scrapes, or sensational situations of the stereotyped kind. It is a simple drama of cause and effect, well told, with surprisingly few sub-titles. The four principal characters are the money-lending waiter and his simple daughter, playing at cross purposes with a society matron and her prodigal son.

The film tells, in a way, the old story about a fool and his money, or, in this case, other people's money; particularly his mother's money and the money-lender's money. The young man gets his spending money from the money-lending waiter, and pays it back by wedding the waiter's mother. This keeps up until financial matters between the families are so hopelessly snarled up that it leads to a crisis, or climax, which nothing on earth can settle except an elopement between the prodigal son and the waiter's daughter.

There are many strong situations throughout the piece. The staging and photography, therefore, we need not dwell on that subject. In one scene there is an ingenious mirror effect, and later on, in the same scene, a wonderful moonlight effect. The picture is entirely a studio product, but the scenes are so interesting that the time and the place are forgotten by the spectator, whose interest is held every moment of the time.

We noticed one thing very particularly in this European picture, and that is the fact that the Europeans are "stealing our stuff." Ordinarily in a Danish picture one would expect the foreign style of acting, such as the shrug of the shoulders and the drag of one foot after the other, and all the rest of the stereotyped styles of the European school. The Europeans are getting wise to facial expression. If it were not for a telephone that looked like a wedding cake and a policeman with a brass kettle on his head, no one would know that it is a foreign film. Not only that, if the Americans do not watch closely, the European actors are going to beat them at their own game of facial expression, because the four scenes in this Danish film were certainly going some in the gentle art of suppressed emotion. It reminded the writer of the palmy days of the Biograph Company, when tense situations were worked up entirely with the eyes and slight movement. This film came as near to being one of the old Biograph masterpieces as anything that ever came from Europe, and it is good to observe that the Europeans are beginning to see some merit in the American school of acting. America is heartily sick of the shoulder-shakers, and it is quite possible that Europeans are getting sick of it themselves.

We have not said a great deal about the story, because in our opinion it is not the strongest plot that has ever been written, but it is ordinarily good. It holds the interest like a vise all the way through, which in itself is a very strong recommendation for any film. It is not an immoral film, and yet it preaches no great moral sermon, except the old standbys such as the moth and the flame, the prodigal son, wine, women and song, and all that sort of thing. But withal it is good every good, and it should never grow old, as it is necessary, from time to time, to have good, fresh material touching on and appertaining to.

The story is about a young man whose spending ability is as large as his earning ability is small. He spends every cent he can get on gay dinner parties with the weariness that stays awake for hire. All this takes money, and he finds that it is easier to borrow money than to earn it; therefore his close connection with the fawning waiter, whose part is so very well played.

In the cold, gray dawn of the morning after, the fawning waiter of the night before is an independent arrogant Shylock. He assumes the airs of a banker, and to him it is the young man's turn to cringe and beg for time. Were it not for the fact that the money-lender has a daughter, whom he houses like a bird in a cage, the spendthrift youth would probably have gone to jail. The picture shows how the miser made his great mistake by being miserly even with his daughter. He locked the door and the bird flew out of the window. When the young man came to beg for time he found opportunity to make a conquest of the money-lender's simple-hearted daughter, which later ended in marriage.

The reader will perceive in the four contrasting characters a wealth of dramatic possibilities. A plebeian, domineering waiter contrasted against an aristocratic widow; her college-bred son eloping with a bourgeois' daughter. The contempt of the aristocratic widow for her son's plebeian wife, which is further complicated by the riches being on the plebeian side and the poverty on the patrician side, and all these conditions stirred up nicely together make "The Temptations of a Great City" one of the strongest melodrama reels that has "come across" in a long time. The interest is so strong that one actually becomes impatient while the reels are being changed. We would advise exhibitors to use two machines, if possible, when showing this film.

The Auto Picture Show

By combining products of the two greatest industries of the age, namely that of automobile and of moving picture manufacture, Mr. Pool, proprietor of the Chicago Stage Light Company, has devised one of the most novel and ingenious of methods for the exhibition of motion pictures and one which tends to become particularly effective for the display of the so-called industrial pictures which are winning favor throughout the country as a productive advertising medium.

Mr. Pool's idea, which has been patented, is to obtain auto trucks such as are used by the large department stores and for moving vans, these trucks to be fitted up with a projecting machine placed behind the driver's seat and pointing toward the rear, where a screen will be arranged upon a frame projecting some eight or ten feet from the end of the truck, thus giving a throw of twenty feet or more. This frame is collapsible and manipulated by a crank.

The sides of the truck will be some five feet in height and will be formed by the advertising curtains which will run on rollers connected with the running gear of the truck by a sprocket device. Thus winding and unwinding from one roller to another at intervals as the wheels revolve. These curtains will be long enough to allow eight or ten advertisements to be run on each side.

It is Mr. Pool's idea to make the advertising on the side curtains pay for the use and maintenance of the "Auto Picture Show," while the exhibiting of the industrial film will net a comfortable profit.

Twenty-eight more machines, it is expected, will be sent out from Chicago this summer, each covering a circuit of the smaller towns and farming communities. Free exhibitions of motion pictures will be given and the music will be furnished by automatic pianos.

The object of the enterprise is purely of an advertising nature and while the programs will be spiced with some comedy, etc., the main feature will be the industrial film. Such concerns as the International Harvester Company and other manufacturers of farming implements, together with the manufacturers of breakfast foods and staple articles will no doubt take advantage of this very effective proposition of real advertising and the possibilities for the venture seem unlimited.

In an address before the State Senate Judiciary Committee opposing the proposed amendment to the Child Labor Law, Miss Jane Addams, Chicago Hull House, leader and sociworker, strongly protested the severity of the bill which would authorize circuit court judges to issue permits for the appearance of children under 16 years of age upon the theatrical stage.

Miss Addams in defending the present Child Labor Law, insists that it is very satisfactory and states that out of 300 "Nickel Shows" in Chicago only four violations were discovered by her assistants. As example of how perfect the present law is working.

It is a pleasure to note that the search for crime subjects among the moving picture theatres was unsuccessful and we trust that the charitable public will soon awaken to the fact that moving picture theatres are anything but breeds of corruption.

THE INDUSTRIAL MOVING PICTURE COMPANY OF CHICAGO SCORES GREAT SUCCESS.

"The 41st Reunion of Confederate Veterans" is the title of the greatest masterpiece ever produced in the so called "industrial" department of the Moving Picture Industry, and well may credit be awarded to the Industrial Moving Picture Company of Chicago for their splendid treatment of the subject.

Realizing that this reunion of the veteran army of the South would be the last great muster of the boys in gray, a number of the public spirited citizens of Little Rock, Arkansas, the scene of this memorable occasion, decided to make it a matter of enduring record by moving pictures, and to this end President Gregg, of the Little Rock Chamber of Commerce, W. G. Hutton, treasurer of Pulaski County, and Judge Kavanaugh conferred with Mr. Waterson R. Rothaker, general manager of the Industrial Moving Picture Company, with the result that the expert camera crews of the company were on the ground throughout the entire reunion and captured the city scene by scene in its gala attire.

The picture made 2,200 feet of photographic excellence, is a complete panoramic vision of the stirring pageants and festivities, and every sentimental and interesting side light of the great event is splendidly depicted. The city, clothed in Nature's most beautiful raiment of southern flowers and foliage, the long shaded avenues, the majestic old southern residences hung with flags and bunting, is a picture of unsurpassed beauty, while the parade of the boys in gray, the remains of that loyal army of the South who strove so hard for what they deemed was right, and now mustered in for the last time, is a spectacle which can but find its way into every heart, arousing sympathy and admiration for that little band who, though defeated in that cause which meant so much to them, still retain that indestructible loyalty to the land of their nativity.

The great welcome extended to the veterans by the elite of southern society, governors and others prominent south of the Mason and Dixon line, Forrest's famous cavalry troop on review, the official reception, the quaint old characters such as the cook and body servant of President Jefferson Davis and Stonewall Jackson, and numberless battle-scarred old heroes who at this time are made young again by associations and the stirring war tunes—all these form a picture of the greatest interest to all. It is a drama, a comedy, a scenic, all in one, produced from a scenario provided by the Great Master, and with the seal of approval placed upon it by the Southern patriots, foremost among whom is Nathan Bedford Forrest, Adjutant General of the United Sons of Confederate Veterans, its excellence will create for it a just demand.

This is the first picture of its kind that has ever been produced in this country, and with it as a criterion, the Industrial Moving Picture Company, pioneers and originators of the idea, are assured of constant success.

Messrs. Hutton and Gregg, of Little Rock, will superintend the distribution of the films and will supply themselves with a sufficient number of copies to care for not only the southern territory but the West and North of the United States where an extraordinary interest is displayed.

"FALSTAFF"—URBAN-ECLIPSE.

The Urban Company's coming release, "Falstaff," from Shakespeare's "Merry Wives," promises to be a true achievement. M. Degeorge, of the Theatre National de l'Odeon, than whom we can imagine no better choice for the role, is to be the Falstaff. He will be assisted by Madame Barjac, of the Odeon, and Madame Louise Willey, of the Theatre Palais Royal; also Mr. M. Coste, M. Bacque and M. Dennis d'Ines. It is also stated that the photography of this film has seldom been equaled.

Sir John Falstaff at a wedding scene full of life and activity perceives that Mistress Ford and Mistress Page enjoy a certain freedom. He thereupon pays court to both and falls head over heels in love with both. He also writes to both of his affection. The two ladies together concoct a plot to ridicule their lover. Master Ford has meanwhile been informed that Sir John has an appointment with his wife and leaves home. Sir John hears him coming, begs to be concealed in the basket of linen ready for the laundress, and is carried out to be tumbled into a stream. Then Mistress Page tells her suitor Sir John dresses as the witch of Brentford, is put upon and severely trounced with a stick, until his identity is discovered, and is ignominiously dismissed.

MOTION FOR PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION DISSOLVED.

Application for the Motion Picture Patents Company against the Powers Company for preliminary injunction restraining them from using the Pathe or the Warwick type of camera has been dismissed with cost to the complainant, the Patents Company. This litigation has extended since last December before a referee, to whom it was referred by Judge Lacombe on a question of fact. Upwards of fifty hearings have been held before the Master, Arthur Berry.

All previous injunctions which have been granted by the United States Courts have been dissolved. These include the injunctions issued against the Champion Company, The Independent Moving Pictures Company of America, the Yankee and Atlas Companies. All other injunctions against any Independent manufacturer will be dissolved as soon as it is possible to make application to the judge.

ATLAS THEATER, MILWAUKEE, WIS.

The Atlas Theater is one of the most unique and handsome playhouses in Milwaukee. The theater is located at 832 Third Street and operated by the Atlas Amusement Company. J. C. Mergener is the manager.

The house will accommodate about 1,000 persons and is provided with a balcony. The Atlas Theater was opened last fall at a cost of $35,000.

One of the features of the house is the construction of the front, which consists of beautiful marble slabs and mirrors. The balcony can be entered from the outside.

POWERS CAMERAGRAPH AT CONEY ISLAND.

The fact that Coney Island, N. Y., is fast becoming one of the central points for the exhibition of moving pictures, and even now is assuming the name of "Flicker Alley," is strongly evidenced by the number of sales recorded by manufacturers and dealers in moving picture apparatus and supplies. The latest arrivals in the exhibiting field at this popular summer resort, are Morris Goldberg, operating the Prospect Hotel, Mr. E. F. McGann, of McGann's Hotel, and Dickers Hotel, all of which have installed a Powers Cameragraph Number 6, and equipment.

Free animated picture shows in Cleveland, Ohio, are being planned by the city officials, which will consist of educational films, including travel lectures and historical productions, and in addition a few comedy pictures will be shown to amuse the children. These exhibitions will be operated in the children's playgrounds located in the congested sections of the city. Two performances will take place each night, one at 7 o'clock and the other an hour later. Public Service Director Lee is working hard to carry out this plan.

Mr. R. L. Edmundson, of London, arrived this week for a short stay in the States, and expects to be back in dear old "Lunnon" in time for the Coronation. Mr. Edmundson is handling the Johnson-Jeffries fight pictures in England for the General Film Company, and his success so far has exceeded his expectations.

To the Victor Belongs the Spoils.

THE HAPPIEST MAN IN NEW YORK.

If you do not believe it, ask Mark Dintenfass himself. But then, you have not had eighteen months of constant worry; eighteen months of dread and apprehension every morning as you commenced the day's work; eighteen months of anxiety all through the day in regard to the next move of clever and well-paid lawyers who were hounding your every step; eighteen months, any day of which you might be haled to court and have these same prosecuting attorneys succeed in having you sent to jail. If you had undergone some such "third degree" for the past year and a half and then found out one afternoon last week that it was all over and that all injunctions and contempt proceedings against you were quashed, then you might feel, as does Dintenfass, that at least there were none happier than you.

The dismissing of all M. P. Patents Company injunctions against the Champion Film Company has cleared the atmosphere like a thunder shower. For over a year these companies have had to be content to get their negatives wherever they could; nevertheless, they have succeeded in turning out some excellent productions. Now that they can work unhampered with the best of every equipment that they desire, we may look for a still greater advance in excellence of their product. "I could not use a broom handle before and had to get out pictures; what ought I to do now when I can use a camera?" was the question asked of the writer, the answer to which will be looked forward to with interest during the coming months. No more law suits and the strain of litigation, and more time and opportunity for concentrated effort in turning out better Champion films are two reasons sufficient to make Mark Dintenfass happiest of the happy for many days to come.

"THE FORTUNES OF WAR."

"The Fortunes of War," the Imp release of Thursday, June 22, is expected to be one of the most successful war stories ever filmed. It is intended for a Fourth of July release, and the spirit of war predominates in every scene. The story is one of patriotism, love, self-denial, sectional strife and manly deeds. The battle scenes are faithful portrayals, staged with close attention to all details to make them real. The love of the brothers, the remorse of the Confederate and his subsequent devotion to the man he has shot, presents a rare type of the men who made history during the days of the bloody conflict. The love of the Union girl for the rebel soldier, who had shot her brother, is an incident in the story that lends a romantic tinge and makes the conclusion all that can be desired.

The Mortimer Film Cleaning Company have just installed an electric machine for cutting their pads for the Mortimer film cleaner, with 342 machines already installed they could not meet the demand by cutting them by hand. The larger exchanges are now ordering them by the thousands, which goes to show that the Mortimer Film Cleaner is doing good work.

ESSANAY MOTOR RACE FILM.

On June 13th the Essanay Company will release their film of the five hundred miles auto race, held at Indianapolis. The reel is full of incident and accident and gives a thrilling portrayal of this hitherto unattempted tour de force in auto racing. It is as lifelike a representation of an epoch making sporting event as could possibly be desired. The most sensational accident, which occurred, was caught from beginning to end by the Essanay camera. The accident took place in front of the grand stand and resulted in more or less serious injuries to five men and great damage to three of the machines. The great race, officially known as the International Five Hundred Mile Motor Race, was won by Ray Harroun, in the Marmon "Wasp." He crossed the line alone at the end of the 200th lap, thereby winning the rich purse, consisting of $10,000. The reel is an extraordinary feature and will no doubt have a long and successful run.

TOM MOORE RESIGNS MANAGEMENT.

Mr. Tom Moore, manager of the General Film Company, of Washington, D. C., recently resigned his position with that company. He will hereafter be identified with the Moore Amusement Company, Plaza Theater Building, 434 Ninth Street, N. W., Washington, D. C.

As many of his friends have been telephoning and writing him to the old address, he wishes it to be known that any correspondence should be addressed to his new place of business.

ENTERPRISE WATCH FOBS.

Ten thousand of these fobs were ordered, but so greatly in excess of expectations has been the demand that a second order is going through. They are exceedingly handsome and superior to anything else of the kind the Enterprise Optical Company have ever had and are being greatly appreciated by all who are sending for them as per advertisement on another page.

Mr. L. B. Stone, proprietor of the Canadian Film Exchange, Calgary, Alberta, Canada, is spending a few days on business in New York. He is looking over all the recent special film hits, and will no doubt return to the coast with a trunk full of them. Mr. Stone is also transacting some private business in New York, which is not so important that he cannot get around and see his friends in the trade. Mr. Stone is very well known in New York, and is greeted in many places.

With the weekly output of film increased, there is a greater demand for scenarios than before, and several schools and printed instruction books are helping to qualify writers to meet the demand. A book entitled, "The Photo Play," written by Ralph P. Stoddard, purchasers' report, gives a clear idea regarding what the scenario should be, and is aiding many beginners in the field. It is sold by the Photo Play Syndicate, 1836 E. 79th Street, Cleveland, O., and with each copy of the book is sent a typewritten copy of an actual scenario, to aid beginners in the preparation of manuscript.

Scene from "Molly Pitcher," Coming Champion Release.

Kansas City, Mo., M. P. World—In the M. P. World for 15th some lady from Pittsburg asks what to play for French pictures. To this question was a short answer. Now I would like to give you as well as I can in my broken English some information about it. I am a Slavonian musician of 25 years (violin and piano). I have Austrian Mittleschule and play from my twelfth year. I played in different symphony orchestras in Europe before coming to America, so you will understand I play high class music, too. I have been in America three years.

"For French pictures (dramas, etc.) there are good waltzes from Waldteufel. There exists a good Waldteufel Waltz album published by White, Smith & Co., Boston. Nice short things are melodies, minuets, gavottes, etc., by different composers (like the 'Melody in F' from Rubenstein), Paderewski, Heller, Moszkowski, Massinet, Scharwenka and Mozart (10 cents a number, McKinley, Eclipse and other editions). I play many times (for French 'salon-life') Chopin's waltzes and mazurkas, some are very pretty for 'salon' pictures. Pieces from Grieg (his 'Berceuse') are good too. Easier are waltzes from Durand (in E flat and F). Schirmer edition publishes nice volumes of French popular music. We mustn't forget Moszkowski's beautiful serenade (Eclipse, Century, etc), or Paul Lincke's 'Lina' and 'Wedding Waltz,' or 'Glow Worm' and 'Amina,' etc. Also Francois Thome's 'Simple Aveu' (Century). That's the music which can always be on the program.

"For shows like 'Hamlet' selections are good; also fantasies and transcriptions from operas like 'Thanhauser,' 'Aida,' 'Traviata,' 'Martha,' etc. (Century, Schirmer and other catalogs.)

"For French-Oriental pictures are good pieces like Schubert's 'Turkish March,' or Mozart's 'Rondo—Alla Turca' (from Sonata XIII). I myself play many times (but by heart, as I know these compositions), some French national songs, and dances like 'Les des Patineurs' (the dance is like a gavotte—see 'Stephanie Gavotte,' Century Ed.), or for Spanish life, 'Pas des Espagnes' (a la Senora, Amo, etc.), and one of the best French is 'Excuse me; I do not know the composer.) 'Rendezvous' (Reqeuse Gavotte). If I can learn the composer and edition of this, and anybody wants to know this, I will be glad to tell him, but I am now unable.

"And who does not know the American popular waltzes and intermezzos, which are very good (some of those like 'Marguerita' and the different 'Roses'-pieces) for French pictures? As for the so-called 'Foolish-head' pictures, I can't find anything better than the Amrican 'rag-time' pieces (rhapsodies).

"I know much about Slavic pieces by heart (Russian, Polish, Bohemian, Slovenian, Crotian, Servian and others) but next time if some one would like it, I am very glad to help with this list if it is of any value."

Your list is a good one and would be a credit to any library of moving-picture music (or any other for that matter). Don't let your fear of "broken English" detain you so long as you have anything as interesting as this letter. Come again. Readers will please take note that "E. M. T." has a few kind things to say about American popular music, even though a trained European musician, experienced in symphony work and only three years in America. Open-minded—what? a bit of a humorist, too; notice that "rhapsodies after 'rag-time'"?

It just goes to show how one can become obsessed by an idea. When correspondents have mentioned "French" pictures you mind always reverted to the military, historical or classic features produced by the various French manufacturers. I never thought the "salon" picture needed special comment; yet it is now evident to me that, to many, the difference between the French and American production of this kind of play is sufficient to call for special musical setting (the "salon" motive is similar to our "society drama" and drawing-room play; usually modern and distinguished from pathe drama by its quieter atmosphere and lack of highly sensational situations). The music suggested in our friend's letter is intended, I presume, for "fill-in" purposes the dramatic episodes, of course will be worked out as usual.

Those who are fortunate enough to see and play for Pathe's beautiful picture of "Il Trovatore" a short time ago will be delighted to learn that their coming release, "Faust," is produced on a scale even more elaborate if possible than their previous effort and what will more interest my readers is the knowledge that a splendid musical setting has been arranged for this picture by a musician who certainly understands his business. There are 38 (thirty-eight) pages of music, which covers the two reels of film. It sells for 75 cents—a trifle less than two cents a page, and all selected from Gounod's immortal masterpiece. I feel that I cannot urge too strongly the advisability of ordering this music early so as to avoid the risk of disappointment, for you really cannot afford to be disappointed in this.

There are two full reels (1650 feet) and 38 pages of piano music. It will interest managers to know that electrotypes have been made for newspaper and other advertising work. There are three of these cuts selected from as many scenes of the play, and may be ordered through your exchange or from the New York office. Price, seventy-five cents per set of three.

And once more, don't delay about that music. The picture is released June 16th, 1911.

It has been regarded practically impossible to keep a drum in good playing condition in damp weather. The very nature of drum heads causes them to absorb moisture readily, and when the heads become damp it is an absolute certainty that the drum will lose its brilliancy.

The problem of how to overcome this difficulty has always been a source of much trouble to the drummer, and while many devices have been tried they have proven either unsatisfactory or impracticable.

The electric drum heater is an efficient, practical device recently put in the market by the Leedy Mfg. Co., of Indianapolis—see their advertisement in another part of the paper—that can be attached to any drum in a few minutes without removing the heads or marring the shell in any manner; in fact, the small metal plate that is fastened to the shell only adds to the general appearance of the drum.

The electric drum heater has many advantages over the electric light globe, which is commonly used, as the heat generated is evenly distributed—not concentrated on one spot—and is so regulated that it never becomes hot enough to bake or dry out the heads. Should the electric light globe happen to break or burn out, it has been necessary to take the drum apart, put in a new bulb, and reassemble the drum—this requires considerable time. The electric drum heater is practically indestructible, will never burn out and can be entirely removed in a few seconds without disturbing any other part of the drum.

Another good feature of the electric drum heater is that it is light, compact, and durable. It can easily be carried in a drum case, and the entire outfit, including the heater, six feet of cord, and the two connecting plugs, weighs but eight ounces—the heater alone but two.

The regular model is so constructed that the proper degree of heat is generated when connected with a 110-volt incandescent lamp socket, but we are prepared to make them to suit any other voltage desired.

This article is an excellent investment, for besides the pleasure derived from having the drum in fine playing condition regardless of the weather, it will save time, worry, and the expense of replacing broken heads.

Readers will note from our advertising columns that the United States Disinfectant Company, of Brooklyn, N. Y., have moved to new quarters. They have also opened a European office in Sollingen, Germany, and within a week or two will open a New York office on Union Square. As the hot season approaches, an absolute necessity in every well-patronized theater is a good disinfectant. The U. S. Company is one of the leading manufacturers of disinfectants and supplies a large number of theaters as well as institutions of various kinds throughout the country. We understand a large number of the exchanges handle their product.

QUESTIONS ON LAST WEEK'S LESSON.

1. What is the speed of light?
2. Describe Römer's method of measuring light speed.
3. What is meant by aberration of light?
4. How apply it to light speed measurement?
5. Describe Fizeau's method of measuring the speed of light.

Physical Optics teaches that light is a radiant energy and that it travels, or is transmitted, by a vibrative motion of the ether. Science teaches that it travels in straight lines, as has been shown, and explains what is meant by the term "ray." In our experiments we consider only the ray, or rays of light. This is necessary in order that we may employ mathematical reasoning and make intelligent drawings. We conceive the ray, but, as a matter of fact, as has already been shown, it has no real existence in fact. We imagine the ray as a line of light and as such we use it for demonstration. The isolation of a line is, however, a physical impossibility, hence the ray is impossible in actuality. By the use of lines, called rays, however, we are enabled to explain the causes of reflection, refraction etc., and deduce the principles governing certain things in connection with light, discovered by experiment. We therefore, with this explanation proceed to demonstrate the known, or deduced fact that light travels in straight lines and is refracted and reflected according to certain set laws.

Reflection of Light.

When a ray of light falls upon a polished surface a portion of the incident light is reflected according to certain laws, the proportion reflected being dependent on the nature of the surface and on its situation.

A Normal.—A line drawn from any point of a reflecting surface in such manner that it is perpendicular to the surface (at right angles to it) at that point, is called a "Normal to the Surface."

Laws of Reflection. (a) If the incident ray be a normal to the surface, the incident ray, the normal and the reflected ray will occupy the same plane, or path, or line.

(b). The angle between the incident ray and the normal and the angle between the reflected ray and the normal will always be found to be equal, as shown in Fig. 14.

In Fig. 14 A N is the normal, I the source of light, I X the incident ray, R X the reflected ray and N the normal. The scale shows angles R X N and I X N to be exactly equal.

The angle between the incident ray and the normal (I X N) is called the "angle of incidence." The angle between the normal and the reflected ray (R X N) is called the "angle of reflection." When the incident ray is normal to the surface the incidence is denoted as "direct."

A simple instrument may be made with which these laws may be shown, as shown in Fig. 15, to which M is a strip of mirror (not the cheap kind, but a strip of high-class mirror which has a flat and true reflecting surface) about one-quarter of an inch wide, S is a scale laid off on a large sheet of paper, and L a candle, lamp or other source of light, and P a pointer, upon one end of which M is affixed in upright position. The scale may be laid off by laying a small draughtsman's scale on the paper and extending its scale with a rule, being very careful to be accurate since a slight error on the small scale will be magnified on the large one. The glass must be set exactly square with pointer P. Now if we set the light opposite 45 degrees, the pointer at 90 we shall find that we will only be able to see the flame in the glass strip when the eye is opposite 135. In Fig. 15 L M P is the angle of incidence, while L M P is the angle of reflection. If these two angles do not show exactly equal by the scale there is something wrong with your apparatus. When the incident is at any point the reflective angle will always be found to read exactly double the normal by the scale. It will thus be seen that the angle of reflection travels twice as fast as the normal, thus: If the incident be 45 degrees, the normal 90 degrees, the reflective angle will be 90 degrees. Move normal to 112 degrees and angle of reflection jumps to 180 degrees, incident remaining at 45 degrees. Study this and reason out its explanation.

Another simple method of showing that the angle of incidence is the equal to the angle of reflection is shown in Fig. 16

In Fig. 10 we are supposed to be looking down from above on a table covered with a large sheet of clean paper, upon which is set a mirror A B held upright on the table in some suitable manner. With a sharp pencil draw the line C D at right angles to the mirror, its center coming to its surface. We then draw the line C E at any convenient angle to A B and at E fix the stick two ordinary pins into the paper so that they stand straight up, or perpendicular to the paper. Now looking at the mirror from the opposite side of line C D we set both eyes so that by closing the eye, held close to the paper, each in turn, first one pin is hidden behind the other, provided both are exactly perpendicular to the paper, otherwise one or both will be partially hidden. We now stick another pin, F, so that it appears to exactly line with pins E and G. Now if we draw a line from C to I, passing through F and G, a ruler serves as shown we shall find I K and E K to be equal, thus establishing the fact that the angle of reflection and the angle of incidence are equal. In making this as well as all other experiments it is important that a surface with absolutely true, flat surface be used, as a screen for experiment must be very thin, else there will be material error due to refraction of the thick glass.

San Francisco Ordinance.—Mr. Albert C. Cohn, Inspector of Nickelodeons and Places of Amusement and Assemblies, Department of Electricity, City and County of San Francisco, Cal., writes: "I have been for some time past an ardent reader of the Moving Picture World and take the liberty in writing these lines with the idea of giving to the readers of your valuable journal a brief synopsis of the method of inspection of moving picture theaters in San Francisco, also find enclosed copy of the Ordinance regulating operating of moving pictures in our theaters. I would state at this point that were it not for the fact that in the May 20th issue of the Trouble Department I read a considerably letter from Salt Lake, I would possibly not have taken the liberty of attempting to enlighten your readers. I believe, however, after thoroughly digesting the Ordinance I submit the same will be appreciated and many of your readers may desire an Ordinance of the same kind be passed in their localities. Since I have been inspector of moving picture theaters and other places of amusement where moving pictures are displayed, I have attempted at all times to cooperate with both the operator and the owner, and I believe that the results brought about by the Department of Electricity of this city are probably better than those in any other part of the country. I took charge of the inspection of these places about fifteen months ago and since that time have made the condition of the operating room such that the operator can at least live therein, for all operating rooms not of sufficient size were ordered enlarged sufficiently so that the operator could conveniently get around the apparatus in the room. At that time a great number of owners were operating their machines (or ordering the operator to operate their machines) by electric motors, which was in violation of the 'National Electric Code' and as the said National Electric Code was adopted as a whole by the Board of Supervisors, this was therefore in violation of the Law of the City and County of San Francisco. Naturally I had a great deal of trouble enforcing the operation of the machines by hand. Being an inspector I was well known and at my approach the doorkeeper or the ticket seller would press the signal buzzer to the operating room, announcing my arrival. By the time I got up the ladder and in the operating room the motor was removed and Mr. Operator was laughing up his sleeve, figuring how nicely he fooled the inspector, not realizing that he was not fooling me, but himself. I studied the question very seriously and came to a realization of the fact that a motor-driven machine, if properly and permanently installed, would not only reduce the fire risk, but also the danger to life and property, by reason of the fact that the operator would at all times have two hands to work with and in case the film broke just below the aperture plate it would not be really necessary for him to stop the show, since, as the motor was running the machine, he would be amply able to take the broken end of the film and attach the same to the take-up reel. Furthermore, it would benefit the owner and patron by giving a more steady, therefore a more satisfactory picture. The result was that the owners and the representatives of the Operators' Union (Local Union No. 162, I. A. T. S. E.) got together with the representatives of the Department of Electricity and after several meetings before the Electricity Committee of the Board of Supervisors of the City and County of San Francisco, recommended the accompanying ordinance to the Board of Supervisors and the same was adopted, signed by the Honorable Mayor P. H. McCarthy, and is now law. In reading over the same I believe that you will agree that none of the precautionary measures are excessive or radical and that the entire ordinance is both conservative and fair, not only to the owner and operator, but to the public at large. On all of the rooms built since I have had the responsibility of their inspection I have refused to approve of the TRAP DOOR EXIT from the operating room and forced construction to be such that the direct entrance and exit to and from the operating room be by means of a regular door, allowing the owner to install the trap door some distance from (outside, I presume, Ed.) the regular door, as in most cases it would work a hardship both architecturally and financially to force him to put in a regular staircase instead of the ladder that is usually used.

"Another matter I have attempted to rigidly enforce was the condition of the room as to cleanliness. I found there could be no greater danger than an accumulation of waste paper, rags, waste, etc.; especially the accumulation of short pieces of scrap film, whether the same be inflammable or non-inflammable. This fault has been largely overcome by enforcement of paragraphs 'C' and 'D' of Section 3 of the ordinance. You will also note that we did not include "NO SMOKING" in the operating room, as we believed that to be a matter for each individual owner to handle if he sees fit.

"There are approximately 100 places of amusement in San Francisco wherein moving pictures are displayed, and the operators in all but a very few of them are thoroughly competent, due in most part to the fact that they are members of the Union and required to pass an examination before getting their card as a journeyman operator. From my own observation I do not believe that there are any better operators in the country than are the members of Local Union No. 162 of the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees.

"Now, as regards our friend from Salt Lake and his comment as to the 'National Electrical Code,' I would just like to say a few words: if the owners who are about to build a moving picture theater would take the time to look up the requirements of the Code and build in conformity therewith, they would have no trouble after completion of their house. I have found that the whole trouble is not the changes made from time to time by the National Board of Fire Underwriters, but the fact that the average owner does not take the time to investigate, or does not know that nearly all municipalities have some ordinance or law governing both the construction and operation of these places.

"I believe the enclosed ordinance will cover all that will be of further interest to your readers and assure you that I will be more than pleased from time to time to impart any further information desired. I trust that before any further censure is laid at the door of the National Electrical Code, those who desire to criticise will first pause to investigate.

"This letter has been approved by the Chief of the Department of Electricity, Mr. Wm. H. Urmy."

The ordinance mentioned reads as follows:

BILL NO. 1688. ORDINANCE NO. 1510.

Be it ordained by the People of the City and County of San Francisco as follows:

Section 1. All electrical appliances and apparatus used in connection with or operated by or for the operation of moving picture exhibitions, shall, with the exception of the provision relating to and restricting the use of motors for the purpose of operating moving picture machines, be in conformity with the rules and regulations set forth in what is known as the "National Electrical Code," said code being rules and requirements for the installation of electrical wiring and apparatus for electric light, heat and power, as the same are now established, and the said rules and regulations, together with amendments and changes made therein from time to time, and which rules and regulations and amendments or changes may be made from time to time by the Department of Electricity of the City and County of San Francisco, are hereby adopted and approved.

Section 2. It shall be unlawful for any person, firm, corporation or association to install, cause or permit to be installed, or operate any motor or other device to operate a moving picture machine until a permit in writing therefor shall have first been procured from the Department of Electricity, said permit to be posted in a conspicuous place in the operating room where such motor is being used, but said permit shall be granted in all cases where the installation of the motor and the wiring thereof shall conform to all the ordinances of the City and County of San Francisco.

Section 3. Permits to operate a moving picture machine with the aid of a motor shall be issued in the name of the owner or owners, shall not be transferable and may be revoked by the Chief of the Department of Electricity for any of the following reasons:

A. Failure of the person, firm, corporation or association to whom the permit is issued to maintain the electrical appliances and apparatus at a standard as required by the National Code and the Department of Electricity.

B. Failure of the person, firm, corporation or association to remedy within five days any complaint on the electrical appliances and apparatus within or about the premises in which the moving picture exhibition is given.

C. Violation of the rules of the Department of Electricity of the City and County of San Francisco.

Section 4. It shall be unlawful for any person, firm, corporation or association to keep locked during the hours in which a moving picture exhibition is open to the public the door or entrance to the booth or room within which the moving picture machine is operated.

Section 5. A—The operator must familiarize himself with the use of all the devices installed for the operation of the electric current in the operating room and the closing of all openings from the operating room into the main auditorium, and must see that all of these devices are kept in perfect working order.

B—No waste paper, newspapers, oil cloths, rags or anything of an inflammable character will be permitted in the operating room, provided, however, that this section shall not be interpreted to govern inflammable film when same are in course of operation or exposed in an approved metal box.

C—The walls and floor of the operating room must at all times be kept clean and no dust, dirt or other rubbish should be allowed to accumulate.

D—Waste or wiping rags will not be permitted in the operating room unless kept in an approved metal box.

E—An approved metal can or metal bucket, partially filled with water, must be placed in each operating room for the extinguishing of waste carbon.

F—The operating room must not be used as a storeroom and no material whatsoever other than that required for the immediate operation shall be kept therein.

G—Under no circumstances shall the operator leave the operating room while a picture, slide or transparency is being exhibited, nor leave the operating room during an intermission without first having disconnected the current from the arc lamp of the moving picture machine.

H—Fuses must not be relied on and no other fuses than Standard Fuses, approved by the National Electrical Code shall be used.

I—Approved protective devices, known as rheostats, to protect open film against burning upon improper adjustment of the current, from coming into the receiving magazine, as well as automatic drop shutter to cover the aperture plate on the gate of all moving picture machines must be provided.

J—It shall be unlawful for any person who is not at least twenty-one (21) years of age to operate a moving picture machine by motor in any place of public assemblage.

K—It shall be unlawful for any person, firm, corporation or association to employ for the purpose of operating a moving picture machine by motor in a place of public assemblage any person who is not at least twenty-one (21) years of age.

L—It shall be incumbent upon the owner of any place of public assemblage in which moving pictures are shown, and upon the person responsible, to visit the operating room at least once a week to see that the requirements of this ordinance relative to the condition of the room are carried out, failure to do so placing the responsibility upon the employer or his or its representatives.

Section 6. Any person or persons, firm, corporation or association who shall violate any of the provisions of this ordinance shall, upon conviction thereof, be subject to a fine of not less than five (5) dollars or more than one hundred (100) dollars, or to imprisonment in the city jail for not more than ninety (90) days, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Sections 7 and 8 merely repeal conflicting ordinances and set the date when the ordinance took effect.

Much space has been given Inspector Cohn's communication and the accompanying ordinance, for two reasons, viz: The San Francisco Department has taken the proper course in giving publicity to its laws governing moving picture theaters through the moving picture trade journal, the Moving Picture World. The editor of this department has several times been requested, quite recently by Mobile, Ala., to help in the matter of securing suitable ordinances governing matters pertaining to operating rooms and the examination of operators. The publication of San Francisco's ordinance will no doubt serve as a guide and aid to other cities seeking to pass legislation governing moving picture theaters and, more particularly, matters pertaining to projection. After carefully reading, I find in the ordinance but one error in the ordinance submitted, viz: the National Code requires that arc lamps used on a theater stage, amid flimsy and highly inflammable scenery, be wholly enclosed. This, on a stage, is eminently proper. The writer, however, insists and maintains that a complete enclosure of the arc is neither necessary nor desirable in an operating room. That the lamp house should be tightly closed, front, top and sides is reasonable and right, but there is no good and valid reason why its back cannot be left open—absolutely none whatever. Tight closing of the lamp house increases rapid deterioration of the cables inside of the lamp house and superinduces excessive condenser breakage. I have said and now repeat there is precisely as much danger of setting fire to anything in an operating room through the open back of the lamp house as there is of setting New York Bay aflame with a match. My second criticism is the lack of a no-smoking clause. It may be all right to allow smoking in an operating room in San Francisco, if the manager approves, but in many cities it positively would not do at all. The "deadly cigarette" would indeed be deadly in its effects. Aside from these two things the ordinance is most excellent in every way. Personally, the editor of this Department is not an advocate of the motor, since with its use the operator has many temptations to neglect careful supervision of his projection. I realize, however, that with the class of men operating in San Francisco the use of motors may be permitted without serious danger of the falling off in results on the curtain. In connection with this matter it may be mentioned that the editor of this Department has just secured from the Department of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity of New York City a promise that immediate arrangements will be made to in future furnish the various trade papers all official promulgations of the Department relating to moving picture theaters, such as any changes in rules of the Department laws, etc. We trust that Mr. Cohn will pardon our comments and criticisms, accepting them in the spirit in which they are given, and we assure him that communications from him will be welcomed at any time. His work as set forth in the letter is altogether good. The National Code errs in making one set of rules apply both to regular stage arcs and arcs located in an operating room. It also errs in not demanding an ample open vent flue from operating room ceiling to the open air, same to be not less than 250 sq. ins.

Words of Commendation.—Mr. H. F. Walls, Manager Maywood Opera House, Corning, Cal., writes: "I have been a reader of your most valuable paper, The World, for a number of years and since you started the Trouble Department I have always looked forward to receiving the first issue. Enclosed please find check for $1.50 for which kindly send me your Handbook. I should like to express my appreciation to you for your efforts through The World for the benefit of the business in general. In closing, I can only repeat what everyone interested must admit: The World is simply great!"

Many thanks for your words of appreciation, Friend Walls. We have tried hard to do the greatest possible amount of good and it is pleasant to know there are those who appreciate our efforts.

High Class Operators Wanted.—Oklahoma (name of town and writer suppressed by request) writes: "Can you put me in touch with five operators who are willing to locate this part of the country? I want men who can do the work and will do it. The company for which I am final operator and electrician is opening five houses and I will have complete charge of all operators, operating rooms and equipment, which latter consists of the following in each house: two motographs, motor driven; 1 double dissolver (dissolver); 1 rectifier; 2 compensators. Everything new and first class. There will be no strutting in the operating room. Hours 7 p. m. to 11:30 p. m.; Saturday, 7:30 p. m. to 11:30 p. m.; no Sundays. Eighteen-year-old boy to re-wind and act as general helper, but must not touch machine except to thread; three reels one song salary $25 which will be increased upon service warrant such action. Must be Union men, belonging to I. A. T. S. E., of which I am a charter member. I am writing you, as you are the only one to whom I can look for first class men. Should you publish this request, please impress upon your readers the fact that I do not care to hear from beginners. Nothing but A No. 1 men, able and willing to deliver the goods will be considered, but to such we offer a good opening. Allow me to congratulate you on your success with the Department. I am an old-timer myself and it seems to me that I met you in Chicago in the old days. By the way, we had some pretty classy projection in those days with the old Speed-lamp, when one seems to consider the equipment an unfair lack of equipment. I have an old machine, a relic of 1901 which I am going to photograph and send to you."

Those brothers who feel able to deliver the goods should write me immediately and presumably the better references you are able to give the more chance you will stand of securing one of these positions. I would like to impress upon my readers, however, the fact that this is evidently a proposition calling for high class men only. That is to say, men who thoroughly understand their business, and it would be sheer foolishness for any one else to apply. All letters and references will be forwarded immediately to the party. We shall be glad, indeed, to have the use of the old time machine, and we trust that through the Department the Brother will be able to secure the kind of men he desires.

Film Jumps.—Napoleon, Ohio, writes: "What makes the film jump off the lower sprocket of my Powers 6A? It seems to climb and jump at every little patch. I have done everything I can think of, but cannot overcome the trouble, and it is a very great annoyance, I assure you."

The trouble may lie in any one of two or three things, but in all probability it is due to too tight a take-up tension. Your take-up tension should be barely tight enough to rewind the whole film. More than that is unnecessary and has a tendency to cause the film to climb the lower sprocket as patches pass over it. It is possible, however, that the lower sprocket teeth are badly worn and it is also possible that the stopper plate (the small plate at the bottom of the apron, held in place by two screws which you can see by looking up through the bottom of the machine when it is off the table) being out of square, which has the effect of throwing your lower loop out of square so that it does not come squarely up on the lower sprocket—it doesn't hang straight.

It may be your lower sprocket idler is set too close or too far away from the sprocket. It should be set practically the machine at two films away from the sprocket and kept that way. It is also possible that your lower sprocket is out of line with the aperture plate tracks, thus producing the same condition that an out of square stripper plate would produce. Attend to these things or any of them that need attending to and then if necessary file out the idler bracket sufficient to admit two more thin washers about 1/4 inch in diameter, one at either end of the lower sprocket idler and you should have no further trouble.

Trouble with Focus.—Montana (name of town suppressed) writes: "We have been secret readers of the Moving Picture World for some time, we have one of the Handbooks and could not get along without it. Have a little trouble in keeping our pictures in focus. At times have perfectly sharp and clear and then suddenly there will be a spot in the center of the screen that is out. Or, sometimes, this occurs on the sides, usually one place at a time. Machine is 1909 Motiograph, one 6 and one 7 inch condenser, the latter next the arc, 2½ inch projecting lens; 44 ft. throw, 11 ft. picture; 110 volts A. C. current, transformer is self cored below and 1½ inch hard above. Machine lines up perfectly, aperture plate slightly worn."

I think you must certainly have misstated the carbon matter and have meant ⅝ above and ½ below instead of vice versa. You would not be able to get good light with the ⅝ inch hard above. I am inclined to think the trouble lies in the worn aperture plate since the fault you describe is very frequently caused by worn aperture plate tracks. As the film passes down through the little hollow worn by the springs, it frequently buckles, that is to say moves in and out as it passes over the aperture plate, and the difference of even so much as the sixty-fourth of an inch in distance of film from the lens will cause a decided blur on the screen. It may also be caused by the tension springs not bearing squarely on the tracks, or being loose, so that they move from side to side. In one of these things, or a combination of all three of them, you will probably find your difficulty. It sometimes happens that aperture plate tracks will wear very badly without producing much effect, then again a plate with only comparatively slight wear will produce all kinds of trouble. It seems to depend a great deal on just how the wear occurs. I might add that very dry, shrunken film has a tendency to buckle sometimes, even with a good plate.

Dynamo Capacity.—Remsen, Ia., writes: "Is a direct current dynamo 1.5 K. W. 60 to 70 volts, strong enough to give good arc light for moving pictures? My electrician guaranteed it to be, but I have had much trouble probably on account of a 3 to 4 h.p. engine which slows down too much when the load is on. The light is bright at the start. I am getting a 6 h.p. engine and hope it will do much better; but I wish to hear from you very early as to whether the above dynamo is capable of doing the work, as I am in haste to get another one, if necessary."

In the first place, Remsen, this is the first communication I have received from you. In the second place, you have written so much on a postal card that it is impossible to make it all out. In stating the K. W. of your dynamo you have written it 1.5. I can only guess at what you mean by that. A 1½ K. W. dynamo would be rather small for your work. On the other hand a 15 K. W. dynamo would be altogether too large. A 60 volt machine is not good for such work; it should be 70 volts at least. You could manage the 60 volt current all right, but the resistance required would be so slight that the arc regulation would be very difficult. In one corner of the card you say something about your lower carbon, but the writing is so fine I cannot make it out. I would suggest, my dear sir, that in future you set forth matters a little more at length, remembering that we are about 1200 miles away and cannot give intelligent advice unless full and complete details are clearly set forth. For moving picture projection I would not consider anything smaller than a 3 K. W. generator of not less than 70 volts, and an engine of capacity to easily handle it without working up to its capacity. A 5 or 6 h.p. engine will do the work nicely, however. Personal replies are not, as I have from time to time stated, made to correspondents unless a fee of at least $1.00 be enclosed to pay for same. Answers through the Department are entirely free and you are at liberty to make as much use of the Department as you may desire.

Light Trouble.—Mr. C. L. Hoover, owner Gem Theater, Audubon, Ia., writes: "Recently the condenser nearest the arc broke after being in use over two years. Since replacing it my light has been a brownish color all around the edges. My throw is 52 ft.; 12 ft. picture; one 6½ and one 7 in condenser, the 6½ nearest the arc. Powers No. 5 machine, 110 volt, 60 cycle current through a compensarc; 25 coiled carbons; No. 6 wire all the way from transformer to arc. Have tried two 6½ and two 7½ lenses and moved the lamp house back and forth, but it does not do any good. Can get a big spot, but the light is brown just the same. The new condenser seems to be a good clear one, has no greenish look edgewise, and have another just like it, but it doesn't seem to make any difference. Have tried all the different ways of setting carbons, but the light is still brown. Had a very pretty white light before the condenser broke. Here is another one that has stumped me: There is a movement of the film of about one inch on the curtain and I am unable to stop it. It also moves sideways about that much. I just put on a new intermittent sprocket, star and cam and bearings, and have intermittent adjusted as close as possible. It has no end movement. I am using a flat steel shoe riveted to the regular tension spring and have a little device which makes it impossible for the tension springs to move down even the thousandth part of an inch. The movement doesn't blur the picture and the shutter is set according to directions in Handbook, though I have tried different settings with no better results. I am using Laemmie service, and while the films are old they are in good running order and seem to be in pretty good shape as to sprocket holes, etc. I enclose sample for your inspection. The Booklet Department is fine and I read it with interest every week. The Handbook is certainly a good one. If any one has trouble with film jumping off the lower sprocket on the Powers No. 5, they may remedy same by putting a thin washer on each side of the idler roller. Have had them on my own machine for four months and haven't had a film jump since their installation."

You seem to have done everything that one could suggest doing. The only additional thing I can think of is that for some reason there has been a drop in your current supply at the arc, which occurred at about the same time as your condenser broke. A lowering of the amperage would be likely to produce a brown light. I do not say this is the case, but it is the only suggestion I can make. I have given your name and address in order that any of our readers who have had similar experience, or can suggest a remedy, can write to you directly. As to the movement of the film, as I understand it, this has occurred since the installation of your new intermittent sprocket. It is quite possible that the new sprocket is not true. If the trouble occurred after the installation of the sprocket, I would immediately request that the Powers Company to send another, you, of course, returning the old one later for their inspection. If there is no side motion in your intermittent sprocket and still there is a rhythmatical regular sidewise motion to the film, the fault must lie in the sprocket. But in this case it ought to occur once every time the sprocket went around, or four times each turn of the crank. If the up and down and sidewise motion both occur in this manner the fault is in the sprocket, or in the sprocket and intermittent shaft combined, there being a possibility that the shaft is a trifle out of true. It is also possible that the whole fault lies in the teeth of the intermittent sprocket, which may have been in some way unevenly milled, or milled a trifle large. Be sure also that your projection lens is not tetering; that is to say, that the tube is not tetering inside the socket. Think in one of these things or a combination of them you will certainly find your difficulty. The sprocket holes in the film submitted are in excellent condition.

Ghost Trouble.—Oklahoma (name of town suppressed) writes: "Many thanks for your reply on page 1138, May 20th issue. I am sorry that I was not more definite in my letter. The ghost is a dark spot in the center of the screen and I am still unable to remove it, though by loosening up my machine and lamp, as per Friend Kirk's plan, page 421, February 25th issue, I have been able to make it some smaller. I am sure the cause lies in the lamp, since the spot is visible at the aperture. Have had my lines tested and they show 110 volts line pressure before entering compensarc. Amperage behind compensarc, as follows: The 14 ampere notch gives 6 amperes; the 40 ampere notch gives 20 and the 60 ampere notch gives 34. So, of course, the compensarc is not delivering the current it is supposed to. We have written the manufacturer, but could not get relief further than instructions to send it back for repairs. This we are not able to do at present, not having anything to use in the meantime. Many thanks for referring my lamp trouble to the Standard people; obtained immediate relief by their sending a lug to go on the tilting screw. Will have a photo of my operating room taken before long and will send you one for publication."

I think, Oklahoma, your ghost must be due to a shadow caused by tip of the lower carbon. This very frequently happens when the lamp is set on a slant and the lower carbon advanced just a little bit too much so that it burns up slightly in front of the lower part of the upper crater. As everything else seems to be all right I am of the opinion that this must be the trouble. Of course, the Ft. Wayne people cannot repair the compensarc unless you send it to them. If they sold it to you for a 110 volt machine and it delivered amperage as above set forth at the start, then they should by all means send you another compensarc at once. However, I would suggest that you go to your local hardware dealer and get some ordinary galvanized wire, about No. 8 gauge. At some convenient place in your operating room attach several porcelain insulating knobs such as are shown on page 12 of the Handbook—the large one on the right hand side marked "Brunt," in two rows, one row above the other and the rows about two feet apart. Coil up, by wrapping it tightly around a broom handle or any other convenient small cylinder, plenty of the iron wire and then stretch the coils on the insulators and use it as a rheostat while you send your compensarc in for repairs. You must put asbestos on the wall behind the coils, of course. If there are laws in your city governing operating room installation, it would be well to secure the consent of the proper department to the use of this arrangement temporarily. On pages 36 and 37 of the Handbook you will, I believe, get an idea of how to construct a rheostat of this kind. The main thing is put in plenty of wire, say not less than 50 feet, and then cut out sufficient of it until you get the desired current. I know of no other suggestion I can offer at this time, unless it be to try pulling your lamp house further back.

Three Wing Shutter.—Chehalis, Wash., writes: "I see you have, on a number of occasions recently, made the statement that a person can use the three-wing Powers No. 6 outside shutter on 60 cycle A. C. and get results. Personally I know of six houses around here that have discarded the three-wing shutter for the two-wing. Take my case, for instance: the supply is 60 cycle, 110 volt, supposed to be. I had a volt meter on the feed wires of my compensarc and the voltage ranged from 70 to 128 in exactly one minute by the watch, and it is that way all the time here. If you can put a three-wing shutter on that and get results, or tell me how to, I would like to see you do it."

I said, Chehalis, and I repeat, that the three-wing shutter can be used successfully on 60 cycle current with the one exception, that it limits the speed to less than 80. When you reach the speed of about 80 the blades get in synchronism with one side of the alternations, producing a flashing, or wavering of the light. The three-wing shutter would have nothing whatever to do with the change in the voltage, unless the speed of the machine changed, in which case, of course, the cycles would change and then the shutter blade would get in synchronism at a lower speed. I should say that a voltage that ranged from 70 to 128 in one minute, or in a hundred, for that matter, would not be fit for projection light, incandescent light, power, or anything else. You couldn't get good results from that kind of voltage with a three-wing shutter, or any other kind of a shutter, since the transforming device (inductor, compensarc, etc.) that would deliver say 50 amperes at 110 volt primary pressure would not deliver light practical for projection on 70 volts primary. The two-wing shutter has this advantage. It cuts a considerable less percentage of the light than does the three-wing. On the other hand, the three-wing eliminates the flicker. Personally, I prefer to use more amperage to secure the requisite curtain brilliancy to having the exceedingly objectionable flicker. The two-wing shutter can be used with all around good results where one is projecting a very large picture, since the flicker on a large picture does not show nearly so much as on a small one.

Carbon Needling.—LaHarpe, Ill., writes: "Am sending sample of carbon butts used on 60 volt A. C. 60 ft. throw, 13 ft. 4 in. picture. Would like to know if excessive needling is caused by poor binder, poor contact or what? 40 amperes used. How long should an aperture plate last? How bad can the holes be before effecting them? How long will sprockets last—how many reels I mean? What causes film to move up and down on screen an inch or two?"

I had the American agent for the carbons examine the butts and write you direct. There was no evidence of poor contact. Indication is excessive current, but that would mean more than 60 amperes. Other reason is poor binder. Try other carbons, same make, and report. The life of an aperture plate will depend on (a) kind of springs used, (b) how tightly they bear on the film. No rule can be given. Have tension springs set just tight enough so that picture is steady and does not crawl up on the screen at highest speed used. Anything in excess of this is too much and wears both film, plate and intermittent unduly. A flat, stiff shoe will not wear a plate so rapidly as will the limber springs, since the pressure is distributed better. Your query concerning life of sprockets cannot be answered at all. To some extent life of intermittent sprocket depends on speed and tension used. To some extent life of lower sprocket depends on tightness of take-up tension. For answer to last question see reply to "Light Trouble," in another place.

A Puzzler.—New York City writes: "Have been working on A C in one place for the past two and one-half years and in all that time have never failed to get good light on my 9 x 12 picture at 50 feet; current 60 cycle, 220 volt A C. Have a compensarc with 14-40-60 ampere contacts. We recently opened an airdome in which the same electrical service is installed, viz: 60 cycle, 220 volt A. C. Am using same compensarc, but I am unable to get a good spot and the light is simply awful. There are two spots on the gate, or two rings of light (overlapping each other, of course), and it is the same no matter how I set my carbons or where lamp house sets. I have changed condenser lenses as follows: two 6½, one 6¾ and one 7, one 8 and one 7¾ and one 8 and one 6½, but the two-ring spot still remains the same. Have taken the same outfit to the other place (theater) and got an excellent spot. Both the light company and the compensarc people have been here and tested things out, reporting everything in perfect condition. Therefore the hands of Yours Truly are up in the air and he is calling for help, constable and police."

After writing the foregoing, the Brother called on the Editor of this Department and secured a promise that he personally inspect the matter complained of, which was done. A dark ghost was removed by pulling back the lamphouse. The lamp was very light in construction and decidedly wabbly, but the double spot seems a corker, all right. There apparently was plenty of amperage at the arc, but no matter what contact the compensarc was set on the double spot remained practically unchanged. My visit was made Saturday A. M. and time was limited, but I propose going out again. The condenser lenses were tilted at varying angles to each other without materially affecting the double spot. As they now are, they set with the bulge of the convex nearly an inch apart. I moved them up close together and the double spot was far worse. At first glance the problem seems certainly to be purely optical, and one the current could not affect. Mature consideration has caused me to question this, however. The latter is inclined to be inclined to believe a line trouble exists—loose connection or something of that sort. Possibly it might be in the pole transformer. The fact that the same identical outfit gives excellent results on the same service elsewhere, would seem to indicate that, impossible as it seems on the face of it, the cause lies with the guilty wires. I shall report the final solution of this matter and meanwhile would be glad to hear from those who feel like offering help. I might add that I could find no reflecting surface, either in lamphouse or lens-casing, capable of producing the trouble.

Transparent Screen.—Mr. F. E. Stetler, proprietor Empire Theater, Reading, Pa., writes: "I note that Mansfield, Ohio, asks information concerning the matter of projection through the curtain. I can aid him in his difficulty, as I have been doing the same thing, at the same distance and agree with you that he will eventually pass it up, the same as did I. He can, however, throw a picture with machine level with screen, without the audience seeing the spot from the lens, by coating a thin sheet with liquid glass, diluted one half with water. The screen should be thin and be thoroughly coated with the glass which closes all pores of the cloth, diffuses the light perfectly, and is transparent. The picture shows as well on one side as the other. He can, however, to have a longer throw to get a perfect picture all over. I have thrown from behind the screen at practically the same distance and with same size picture for the past four months and know it much better than front projection. I eventually changed to front projection, however, to get a longer throw, therefore a better picture—better definition (focus). If Mansfield wants to try out the method I have given in an article I have sent to Moving Picture World, I will sell him for $50 and agree to match, which I will sell for $50. Both lenses are in good condition and will do the work all right, giving the same picture he wants at the distance stated. I will say that he can only use two makes of machines for the purpose, viz: the Lubin and the Motiograph. The lack combination of any projecting machine is the inability to get a long throw plate and with other machines this cannot necessitate removal of the inside shutter. All other machines except maybe the Powers, fix with outside shutter, have intermitting gears of wrong size and movement. Earl Shuster, Mansfield boy, my guess his picture won't be any too good, but as good as any boy in getting out of that angle will get. The back projection is certainly a great stunt as an advertisement. You have your patrons guessing where the picture comes from. With me I packed my theater night after night.

The house could not hold all the curious people intent on seeing the scenery in which was the picture come from?"

The above letter is dated May 24, but just reached me. I would suggest that letters meant for the Department should be directed to "Trouble Department, Moving Picture World." We are obliged to you, on behalf of our readers, Negative Setter, for the information contained in your letter. It probably is a little late to help Mansfield, but it will undoubtedly aid others. With good diffusing surface, such as frosted Smoke, save the liquid glass coating makes, and a throw accommodating, say, a lens of not less than 4 inch F. 8, back projection is the ideal condition. Such a throw is seldom available, however, behind the curtain. You are wrong about matinees. The Edengraph shutter (1005 No. 2 Model, the only one I have available for measurement) is 1/25 inches open from the aperture plate. The Edengraph is an excellent machine for such an extreme proposition as this, for several reasons. The outside shutter machines are not at their best on such an extreme case, since the shutter cannot be gotten close enough to the lens. They can, however, handle it by having a special shutter, with extra wide blade, installed. Good results, however, are specially impractical with such extremely short throws, no matter what machine is used.

Excellent Projection.—At the Park Row Theater, Park Row, opposite the main postoffice, New York City, one sees very good projection indeed, Mr. Herman Rinsler being Chief Operator in charge of projection. The light is brilliant, white and well handled. Mr. Rinsler and his assistants are to be congratulated on the excellence of their work. The theater is equipped with a screen coated by a preparation, the invention of its manager, giving remarkably good results in perspective. We tried to induce him to publish the receipt, which is not for sale, but without avail. This is, we believe, no error. If everyone took that stand, the progress of the picture and its projection toward perfection would be slow indeed.

Hendersonville, N. C.—Jno. Bradford is opening a new motion picture theater, to be known as the Pastime, under the Hotel Oates and will seat 500. $2,500 is being expended in fitting up the place. Licensed films will be run in connection with full orchestra and high-class singers.

The Halsted Theater, at Sixty-second and Halsted Streets, a picture of which is given herewith, is another of the very pretty houses to be found in the residence sections of the city. It is owned by Frank and Timpson, who also have some houses in Cincinnati. The front is in delicate green and white, and the interior is very pretty, the predominating color being green, with handsome landscape panels. Projection in this theater is very good, the picture being of moderate size, but steady and well illuminated. The screen is one of those rare ones which is really a pure white. Manager Timpson expressed himself as being in favor of this sort of screen, as giving a much smoother picture than those painted with aluminum compounds. Films used are Independent, generally first run for the first reel, though the others are mostly old enough to be rainy. The patronage of the Halsted is in keeping with the character of the house, as may be expected, and business at this house seems to be good.

The Standard Theater, on Sixty-third, just west of Halsted Street, is about the oldest picture show in the neighborhood. Two reels of Licensed films are shown, but they are shown badly. About eight unshaded red lamps cast their full light upon the screen, with serious effects on the picture. The light on the picture is fairly good, so that the reason for the bad pictures is not in the operating room, but in the unshaded side lights. The pianist played very well to the Edison subject, "In the Baggage Coach Ahead," but her work was marred by the hoarse tones of the barker outside shouting, "Coming on now! Step right in! No waiting!" Which last was quite true, for the house was only half filled.

The Glamour Theater, on Sixty-third Street, near Wentworth Avenue, is another pretty house which has succeeded with pictures. It is an attractive place, built originally for a vaudeville-and-pictures program, but discarded the vaudeville to run straight pictures. The floor is cement, heavily sloped, so that a good view of the screen is had from all seats. Projection is above criticism, the picture on the screen is very bright, steady and free from flicker. A motiograph machine and a mercury arc rectifier account for the quality of the picture. The screen, too, is excellent, giving as brilliant a picture as the aluminum screens, without any of their shadows. The picture is of good size, about fifteen feet wide, with great depth and perfect definition. Licensed films are used, and a very noticeable thing about the service is its newness, the first reel being second or third run, the second and third reels, ten and twenty days, respectively. As the reels are shown, a slide is thrown on the screen announcing, "Our Show Consists of Three Parts. First [illegible] or part 2 or 3, as it may be, serving to clear the house of those that have seen the show without giving offense like the usual "chaser" slides. Also, the program of films for the coming week is shown announcing the change several days in advance. These slides were evidently made on the operating room, but were clean and neat, showing care on the part of the operator.

Organization Needed.

There has been introduced in the Indianapolis City Council an ordinance forbidding establishing theaters, shows or other entertainments, including moving picture theaters and kaleidoscope exhibitions, within 500 feet of any building used for educational purposes, such as public, private and parochial schools. The ordinance provides a penalty of $50 fine, each day's violation to constitute a separate offense.

It is the general opinion that the ordinance is invalid and it was introduced only upon the very urgent request of the Indianapolis Federation of Public School Teachers, composed of 680 teachers of the public schools. The federation at first demanded moving picture theaters should be kept 1,000 feet away from school buildings, and the ordinance introduced is a compromise between the federation and individual members of the council.

A public hearing on the question of moving picture theaters was recently held by the committee on ordinances of the council and the whole question of regulating moving picture theaters was gone into thoroughly. The school teachers could present no satisfactory reason for wishing moving picture theaters kept away from school buildings, in view of the fact that such places in the vicinity of schools do not open until 7 p. m.

The teachers presented a report purporting to show that constant attendance at moving picture theaters has a tendency to excite school children and make them inattentive to their studies. It was also charged that some of the theaters present pictures of a "clap-trap, sensational variety."

A large number of moving picture theater proprietors were present, and they admitted that some regulation of their places should be made, but are inclined to see how an ordinance keeping the places away from school buildings would solve the question. There was some favor expressed for an ordinance forbidding school children under sixteen years of age attending moving picture theaters unless attended by a parent or other adult.

Within a few days, what will be the largest airdome in the city will be completed. This is being erected by the Atlas Amusement Company and will cover an entire city lot at 2145 E. Washington Street, in a railroad district. There will be a seating capacity for 3,000 persons. The walls of the airdome are of corrugated iron, while a fancy wood front is being erected. Seats will be wood benches.

M. E. and C. E. Enoch are erecting an airdome at Tenth and Oxford Streets, which will have a seating capacity for 500 persons. It will be open about June 1.

With the Western Producers

By Richard V. Spencer, Los Angeles.

The Kalem Western stock company are about to go to the northern part of the State for a months visit. For the past month or so they have been at work in the Santa Monica Canyon, some twenty miles from Los Angeles. In the near future Jeannie Dixon and General Manager Anderson, and the members of the stock company, will leave for Los Gatos, near San Francisco, where they plan to take a number of Western pictures.

Mr. Dennis Boggs, general manager and chief dramatic director of the Selig Polyscope Company's coast branch, reports that the other half of the company under the direction of Mr. Bosworth have reached the Yosemite and settled down to camp life for the next three months to come. The test made by the company spent in the North proved a hazardous one for the actors. The writer recalls an incident that occurred during the making of the Selig film "The Long Trail." The picture was taken in the high Sierras among the snow during the month of June. Mr. Bosworth, who this year is one of the Selig dramatic directors, played the leading role. Those who saw the film will recall his hazardous feat of swimming the torrential Truckee river rapids for a quarter of a mile. Yosemite is conceded by travelers to be one of the eight wonders of the world. Last year the Selig camera recorded some wonderful views of the waterfalls and other scenic attractions of the park, and this year's films of the valley should be even more beautiful by reason of the big improvement in Selig photography.

The Bison Company, under the direction of Mr. Frank Montgomery, is still at work in Santa Monica Canyon. The players have been at work in the canyon for the past two weeks and will probably remain for a week longer. This canyon is beginning to rival Griffith Park as a headquarters for the different film companies. Last week the Biograph, Essanay and Bison companies were all at work within a few miles of each other. The Pathe company has also taken a number of films in the big canyon.

Miss Virginia Chester, who formerly played ingenué leads with the Pathe West Coast stock company, and who had just recovered from a dangerous operation, was again stricken with serious illness, forcing her to again return to the hospital for another operation, is, at this writing, lying at the point of death in the Clara Barton Hospital. It is understood that the Pathe Company are holding back several unfinished pictures in which she appeared, pending her recovery, when it is hoped to finish the films.

Mr. Fred Siegert, a local moving picture manufacturer, recently put out of business by the Federal Court, because of the court's ruling that he had used an infringing camera to produce his films, has been cited for contempt of court, and is being searched for by Federal marshals and secret agents. It is reported that Siegert has left the State. The writer is also informed that the Motion Picture Patents Company have secured an injunction against the American Film Manufacturing Company, enjoining them against the use of an alleged infringing camera. The same authority also states that the case is to come to trial before the local Federal courts at an early date.

The Co-Operative Film Manufacturing Company, a new local corporation about to enter the producing field, starts to work next week making films. Active work has been delayed owing to the failure to arrive of a specially ordered Bausch & Lomb camera lens. The lens has arrived, and as a consequence work at the studio will hum. The company have a number of the local moving picture colony actors under contract. A recent fire at the company's studio, 749-51 South Broadway, Los Angeles, damaged the company's stock and equipment to the extent of $5,000. This has also helped to delay active work, but now that repairs have been made and new apparatus installed, the company will get busy on their projected reels. The company will use a new strictly non-infringing camera, the inventor and manufacturer of which is about to establish a factory in Los Angeles. The writer recently witnessed a demonstration of the new camera, and examined the work turned out by it on Eastman stock, and as a result of the investigation predicts a wonderful future for the camera and its inventor. A future issue of the World will contain an interview with the inventor, when it will be possible to go into more details and to illustrate the invention.

The Selig Company have recently entered into a remarkable contract with the Franciscan Fathers, and other church authorities, whereby they secure the exclusive right to photograph the following Missions controlled by the above authorities, namely: San Gabriel, San Fernando, Santa Barbara, San Juan Capistrano, and several others. Other film manufacturers are warned to "keep off the grass" under penalty of the law, and litigation unendable—even other members of the Patents Company. The Biograph Company recently went to one of the Missions to take a film, but learning of the contract, found themselves barred and retreated without accomplishing their purpose. The contract with the Franciscan Fathers, who manage the different church properties, dates for one year, during which the Selig Company are the only motion picture company allowed to photograph the Missions, or surrounding property in the Mission estate. In addition to the year contract, the Selig Company hold an option to continue the contract for five years, if they are so disposed at the expiration of the first contract. Sometime ago the American Film Manufacturing Company's Western company, after having been warned by the Selig Company of the contract, by a ruse, succeeded in photographing portions of the San Juan Capistrano Mission. The Selig Company local officials claim that the priest in charge of the Mission was lured on an automobile ride, and that during his absence the American camera was used to good advantage. The Selig Company have threatened to bring suit against the American Company unless the matter is settled out of court. California has long been noted for the beauty and variety of the scenery, but this is the first time ever recorded where photographers were enjoined from photographing outside scenery.

The Selig Company are at work upon another film of the series of fire pictures that they are making with the aid of the city fire department, which has already figured in several of the recent Selig releases. The film now in the making will deal with the Los Angeles harbor fire-fighting equipment. Members of the company recently went to San Pedro, the harbor suburb, where they kindled a smoke smudge in the "Alden Besse," an old bark, then summoned the fireboat tugs and San Pedro fire engines to help put out the imaginary blaze. Los Angeles firemen are evincing a big interest in these fire pictures, and are often seen at local moving picture theaters watching their work in the pictures. They are eagerly awaiting the release of the Selig film showing the destruction of the Byrne Building, a local $250,000 fire that was photographed by the Selig camera.

CORRESPONDENCE

Los Angeles.

Incorporation.—The Southern California Amusement Co., have recently filed articles of incorporation with the Secretary of State. Capital stock $50,000. Directors: G. Lackey, John Burton, Wynn Meredith. The company are said to be planning the immediate erection of a moving picture theater in Los Angeles.

Hyman's Venice Theater.—"The Neptune" opened Monday, the 22nd, to a packed house, which was generous in its praise of the new seaside picture palace, and showed its appreciation of the exclusive first run Independent pictures and vaudeville. The Neptune is featuring the leading Independent films, and is booking the Hert Levey circuit of Independent Vaudeville Theaters. This year is a wonderful season for Venice, and, unlike other concessions, the season having begun two months earlier than usual, and as a result, traffic in the beach resorts is unusually heavy for so early in the season. The theater has the best location to be found on the beach resort and should play to big business until late in the fall.

Southern Cal. M. P. Men's Association.—Has been incorporated under the law of California, May 12th, 1911. An attractive membership certificate, neatly framed in glass and wood, and bearing the signatures of H. W. Nixon, Pres., and Arthur S. Hyman, Secretary of the Association, has been presented to each member of the Association. Needed reforms are now under consideration. One of these is, that the members of the Association will inform their employees that upon leaving the service of the members connected with the Association, will be issued certificates of merit, provided that they have done their work satisfactorily. Employees of work holding these certificates, if presented at the headquarters of this Association, or similar associations, will be offered every courtesy, and employment, if a position is open. The writer is informed that this idea has for some time been in use by other exhibitors' associations throughout the U. S. The Los Angeles end of the Association is now in a flourishing condition, due to the hard work of Mr. Nixon in lining up indifferent exhibitors. The Association now numbers more than 75 per cent of Southern California exhibitors on its membership rolls, and is doing a great deal of good work for the exhibitor from various evils. It was largely through the efforts of this Association that the recent obnoxious amended Strobridge bill was defeated at Sacramento, and for this, if for no other reason, it has earned the loyal support and approval of all Southern California exhibitors. The defeat of this one bill alone saved Southern California exhibitors thousands of dollars. The writer is informed that the Association entertains a deep serious interest in matters pertaining to the Open Market and National Convention ideas, so long and ably advocated by The Moving Picture World.

National to go Independent.—The National Theater, Main Street, near 5th, is the latest recruit to join the landslide into the ranks of the Independents. The theater has for some time been a Mutual house, but has now signed up for Independent service, with the California Film Exchange, beginning Monday, 29th.

Plaza Theater Goes Independent.—The Plaza Theater, North Main Street, near the Post Office, under the management of Stern & Gore, is to go Independent Sept. 1st. The Plaza will receive its service from the new exchange, the California Film Exchange. Three months ago, of the four theaters on N. Main Street, three were Licensed and only one Independent. Today, the situation is about reversed.

J. L. Oden, formerly road man of the Los Angeles branch of The California Film Exchange, of Portland, Ore., and Seattle, Wash., of late years, has been transferred and given full charge of the Phoenix office of the company. The Phoenix branch, recently established, is located at Adams & Center streets, Phoenix, Ariz.

New San Bernardino Airdome.—What is declared to be the finest airdome ever erected in Southern California, the Colony Airdome, San Bernardino, Cal., opened June 1st, with Independent service. The new airdome is under the management of Leonard & Mesteyer.

Film Pirates Abroad in Los Angeles.—Film pirates are abroad in Los Angeles and vicinity, looking pinch of the Stone Age, or before, as masterpieces. Aided by lurid feature banners and other obnoxious advertising, they are misrepresenting, in every way possible, the moving picture industry, to the detriment of honest exhibitors in particular, and the moving picture business in general. Picture patrons upon being "stung" by these faked pictures will not, as a rule, discriminate between the real and the bogus article of the business, or distinguish him from his law-abiding rival, in venting their disgust at such flimsy fabrications. These pirates are not to be deterred by such advertising, and paying their money into the box office, have nothing to say, but the box office later tears the result. Worthy feature pictures are made, such, for instance, as "Buffalo Bill's Wild West" and "The Fall of Troy," "The Tale of Two Cities," and similar masterpieces, cannot be praised too highly, for the picture patron gives his money gladly to see them and considers it well spent. It is the mercenary few who are willing to boost it into the class of the above mentioned films by questionable advertising deserves the severest censure. The writer is informed that enough pride in his house and in the business to refuse the ofly advances of the 5c per cent pirate, who, if not promptly suppressed, is bound to seriously hurt the business.

Building Permit.—The City Building Department has issued a permit to Arthur S. Hyman, owner of the Hyman Theater, for a $500 addition to the Hyman Theater, 8th & Broadway. The local theater will have the contract to do the work.

Theater Co. Sued.—The Bell Theaters Co., proprietors of the Bell Theater, a moving picture and vaudeville theater on East Fifth Street, have been sued in a local Justice's Court, by Lindsay Lucas, a vaudeville actress, who has built up and claims to be the originator of the somewhat risqué branch of contract. Miss Lee claims that she had a right to perform under a contract entered into with the vaudeville company wherein she claims she was to get $10 a week for three weeks. She claims after working only three days, the defendant company closed her engagement without the customary two weeks' notice. She does not fix the amount of damages in the complaint, but leaves that to be determined by the court.

Incorporation.—The International Moving Picture Co. have filed articles of incorporation with Secretary of State. Capital stock $15,000. Directors in the new corporation are: Louis Asel, E. M. Dennegan, L. P. Clausen. Attention is called to the fact that one of the directors is a Japanese. The little known city of the local colony control three moving picture theaters in Los Angeles.

Arthur S. Hyman as Host.—Sunday, the 28th, Mr. Hyman will play host to a local newsboys' band. He has chartered a special car, and will take some thirty or more newsboys to Venice early in the day for a day's outing at the beach. In the afternoon the boys will attend the performance at the new Neptune Theater, one of the most luxurious moving picture theaters in the world, recently completed at Venice. The idea originated in the Los Angeles newsboys many times at the various Los Angeles theaters, and every newsboy in the city knows him at sight.

New England

The Motion Picture Palace of Savin Rock, near West Haven, Conn., is soon to be entirely remodeled by Manager Mitchell. It is planned to increase the seating capacity of the Palace, and to redecorate thoroughly both inside and outside.

A New Theater, despite itself overpowered by the exhibition of moving pictures and vaudeville, will be opened in New Bedford, Mass., on or about June 15. This house will have a total seating capacity of somewhere more than 2,000 people, and is the old Elm Rink, completely remodeled and renovated from cellar to roof. Mr. J. A. Burke will manage the management of the new house. Manager Burke is well known in the local and around the town business men, as he has been in the business for years.

The Central Square Theater, of Lynn, Mass., has made a number of changes of policy, with a view to accommodating the big seating demand. Changed bills are now being presented in place of the former stock company. The Central Square has also lopped off the vaudeville from its bills, and has placed illustrated songs on the program to take its place. Three reels of feature pictures are also to be shown, and the house now has two daily and illustrated songs. It is a busy strong bill.

The Portsmouth Theater, of Portsmouth, N. H., has closed its regular dramatic season, but has decided to remain open this summer on the scene of "pop" vaudeville and pictures. This is an experiment for the Portsmouth.

Providence Notes.—The big event now just over-night, and immediately, the Managers Protective Association of Rhode Island, has again caused its mettle showing that the praise accorded this Association in these columns, was well deserved. The prohibition of moving picture theaters in and around Providence have been moving considerable trouble with their operators, as it is alleged. At a meeting of the Central Labor Union, it was decided that operators suspended as unfair, must be given a proper authority, and to adjust matters. According to reports made at the meeting of the Labor Union, the suspensions were made by the organization of a "Moving Picture Operators' Union. The statement was made at the meeting that this fact has come to the notice of the managers of the moving picture theaters in Providence, and that the latter have declined to be compelled from by immediately discharging their operators on 24-hour notice their notice to quit on a certain date. Mr. Charles Lowenberg, speaking on this question as President of the Managers' Protective Association, emphatically denied that there was any authority existing between managers and operators. Information to the effect that the Union had been in existence for a number of years, and that it had been the custom to discharge all operators. The Westbrook New England picture theaters has used the words "enlarged" and "claimed" because he also has not been able to locate any information, affirming or otherwise, regarding the new Rhode Island operators. Some one has evidently tried to make some trouble along the "Union" as the news and are failed.

The Cummings Theater, Fitchburg, Mass., has opened a supplementary season devoted to moving pictures and songs, with Mr. Ed Rosenbaum installed as general manager. The idea of "nightmare" theaters originated in New England using moving pictures as a means of remaining open and of making money, and the summer is showing that the idea is true. This is also worthwhile to the regular theaters.

The Dreamland Theater, Lynn, Mass., has just given June 3, was present one of the largest and best shows ever put together in Lynn. This is the only admission charged. Thursday, June 1st, the house was closed for extensive renovation and enlargement. Proprietor Rosenbaum decided to place the bills booked for the following week in advance of the regular time. On Wednesday, June 7th, the house will open with a new policy. When presented for the season it proposes to present Mr. Rosenbaum in the light of a manager of one of the most successful and also in regard to the most successful seasons and plans to engage in the early fall will be one of the largest and best equipped theaters devoted to the vaudeville and picture industry.

Woonsocket, R. I. is in possession of a new but opening the price to be paid for licenses for theaters. The new law provides that the fee shall be $200 for theaters having a seating capacity of 500 or less. The fee for moving picture houses has not as yet been announced.

The Hartford Theater, Hartford, Conn., has given up the vaudeville attractions over the summer and now has about a moving picture vaudeville and a few vaudeville acts. The house opened under this regime May 29, and had a very successful week's run.

The Gordon Bros.' Family Theater, Chelsea, Mass., has cut the vaudeville from its bills, and has reduced the admission price to the house during the hot months.

The Broadway Theater, Everett, Mass., has cut out its vaudeville features, and is now showing W. F. George's high grade moving picture programs.

Houses everywhere throughout New England are cutting vaudeville down the summer by inserting all moving pictures, and it looks as though the season will decline a considerable amount during the hot months.

Bridgeport is going to have another theater this season. Wilbur Wilmot is planning one on Lafayette Square to seat 1,000 persons. Sneaden runs one on Fair Street. Charles Isham has started a new theater on Main Street, and Fred Bennett has a new one on Fairfield Ave. Work will soon be started on the Lyric, Lafayette Square theater. It is expected that the house will be ready for occupancy by the first of September. Mr. Wilmot is one of the best known showmen in the state. He is at present conducting the Wilmot Theater on Main Street, and is also interested in the Strand Theater, Stamford, Conn. He is a member of the Masonic order and is well liked by all. It is expected that the new theater will be a fine place to sit and see pictures.

A new airdome has been started in Branford. Conn., called Pleasant Beach Park.

The Hopkins and Gayety theaters, which are being run with picture bills during the summer and touted as "the coolest spots in town" by the Empress Amusement Company, besides, are cleaning in fine shape, owing to the attractiveness of bills and coolness of interiors, according to Manager Irvin C. Simon. The other Empress houses, the Orpheum, Casino and Superba, are also making money, said Mr. Simon.

Another amusement company was formed last week by Irvin C. Simon, of the Empress enterprises, together with W. A. Kinney and others. The new company is called the Empress Amusement Company, to operate in picture shows and other amusement devices. It is capitalized at $50,000, divided among the following incorporators, with shares of $100 par value: W. A. Kinney, fifty-eight shares; Irvin C. Simon, fifty-eight shares; William B. Thomas, four shares.

The Walnut, now running a motion picture bill for the summer, is reported to be making good with a vengeance. The Walnut features is a straight five-cent admission rate, which has proved to be very attractive during the short run of the new theater.

John Ward, manager of the Avenue, says that he is paying especial attention to the cooling devices of his establishment, having recently completed the installation of some new fans, so that the interior of the popular Fourth Avenue store-house is of almost arctic temperature. The comfortable and picture programme is winning the Avenue a lot of business these days.

The policy of advertising in moving picture theaters through the medium of screen displays is well-known to the average merchant, manufacturer or professional man, but a big advertiser in Louisville used three prominent moving picture houses with much success a short time ago, but pictorial is worthy of comment.

Charlie "White-Moon" Bunce, a renowned herbalist and nature physician of the Falls city, who attracted much attention to himself through his cowboy dress, wild Western methods and subsequent trial and acquittal before the State Board of Health, on a charge of practicing medicine illegally in Kentucky, decided to give a big motion picture party to his hundreds of supporters in the city, prior to his departure, in a big Stearns automobile for a tour of the "bad lands," which were once his habitat. The versatile herbalist accordingly rented three picture establishments, the Savoy Theater and the Ideal and Baxter airdomes, to their patrons, for one evening, to accommodate his clientele on the points occasion. The herbalist then procured a two-column page-length space in each of the local dailies, publishing a farewell to his friends, and at the same time a coupon by which they could secure admittance to any of the theaters mentioned. The night of the festival was marked by tremendous attendance, all true but through the courtesy of Mr. Bunce, to be sure, but nevertheless of considerable advertising value to the theaters included, as well as to the Westerner.

A report to the Louisville correspondent of The Moving Picture World, says that the Avenue Theater, in New Decatur, Ala., which has been closed for several months past, opened up again last week for a summer run of vaudeville and motion pictures.

The news also comes from Paris, Tenn., to the effect that a $25,000 moving picture theater, to be known as The New Dixie, will be opened in that city within the next few months, plans for its erection being now in the hands of contractors Richards & Frazier. T. B. Weaker, vice-president of the First National Bank of Paris, is the owner of the new theater, which will be under the managership of O. C. Jackson. The New Dixie will seat nearly 1,000 people. It will be of the latest design, being equipped with ladies' retiring rooms, boxes and all the accessories of the up-to-date picture house.

Meyersdale, Pa.—The Auditorium has closed as a roller skating rink and opened as a summer garden, showing two reels of high-class Independent motion pictures and using a five-piece orchestra, with no singer. Refreshments are served while the pictures are being shown, tables are placed around on different places on the floor under big palm trees and laurel arbors lit with colored lights, making a very inviting garden effect. On account of its size, it is very cool during the hot summer months.

Mr. Philip Reech, the manager, writes as follows: "We opened with the Saroon Italia production, The Fall of Troy, and it certainly is a great piece of work, and the Itala Company deserves great credit for putting on such a masterpiece. The people who saw the picture are talking about it yet. The 6th of May, last year, we went Independent, and the Independents are certainly putting out the pictures. Every release is getting better. We have the daylight pictures, which are a great convenience."

FROM DEATH TO LIFE.

An Ambitious Mythological Tale By the Rex Company.

This film pressing and cleverly develops a new and striking plot. The wife of an ancient savant is through a tragic accident turned into stone, but returns most unexpectedly back to life. No violence is done to the dramatic possibilities and the acting is good. The story is laid in classic Rome, an anachronism, for no such modern laboratory as is shown in this film was known in ancient days. This is a defect, however, which will pass unnoticed by most spectators and in no wise detracts from the interest of the action. The reel is an ambitious effort in the right direction.

"Curiosity" (Biograph).—One wonders how the Biograph proposes going to produce "Curiosity." A great many actors in the picture show curiosity. The producer must be a philosopher and must have wanted to show how curious the human mind is, and how curious is just in using a moving picture camera to do it. He used a grown man to send to the mill.

"A Dutch Gold Mine" (Biograph).—This story is an amusing anecdote. It is an old chestnut also, taken, this reviewer guesses, from The Youth's Companion. The scenery is fine. Both Dutch and the horse-dealer are vaudeville characters. It's exciting, and as most of its spectators will not have read it, it may be very successful.

"Bertie's Reformation" (Kalem).—Here is a lively comedy played with spirit and appreciation. It tells the story of a young man who is addicted to the cigarette habit, and how he is outwitted by his father. It is a good comedy, well played, and the story is so clear there can be no misunderstanding it. The company deserves praise for the excellence of this film.

"The Flag Didn't Rise" (Pathe).—This war time story has a freshness and realness of a private soldier for its theme. As a consequence of this, the private is wrongly accused and condemned to be shot, but the heroine arrives at the place of execution in time to save his life. The picture is well photographed and well acted, but the story is not strong, nor is it novel. The actors have made as much as possible of it, however.

"The Ends of the Earth" (Vitagraph).—This is a story of civilization, in the early scenes, where the backgrounds are a corner of a drawing-room, a bit of a boudoir, and a fireplace, and of the Northwest, in later scenes, where the backgrounds are snowy hills and fields, a dog-sled and Canadian cabin. Some of these pictures, particularly that in which the "huskies," about fourteen of them hitched together, draw a sled along a frozen river with a pine tree background, are very interesting. The husband of the story, though much in love with his wife, abandons her because she seems to dislike him, and goes to the Northwest. Later, the wife, who has become a mother, comes to seek him, and, pushing heroically on over snowy deserts, rescues him from dire peril. It's an interesting story, well acted. There are some impossible things in it, but on the whole it is effective.

"The Fires of Fate" (Vitagraph).—The theme of this solemnly acted and, considering it only scene by scene, unusually beautiful, drama is not a very high one. It is this: A Vestal Virgin, for love of a man, neglects the sacred fire in which she believes, and then calls upon the God of Christians to save her and the man from the difficulty. They escape. It is beautiful because scholarly intelligence was used in producing it, and it pictures the rites of the Vestals and their solemn adoration of the mystery of the fire with fidelity to the spirit of the scenes. Perhaps a chance was missed by not showing the moment when Ione and Calchas discover that the fire on the altar behind them is dead. The scenes in the prison are far from convincing, as is the escape.

"A Sane Fourth" (Edison).—This picture, though not as good as it might have been, shows how strong the motion picture can be as an argument. It is very effective, but it is made so wholly by the presence of the children, the political scenes being hardly sensible. The physician in this picture is like doctors in other moving pictures; one would think he wanted to frighten his patient to death. No good doctor ever acts so. Lockjaw is a terrible disease. No agony that could be shown on the screen would begin to over do it. However, the playlet is strong enough, and will do much good. It is just the kind, too, that will be popular, and be in great demand.

"Her Son" (Kalem).—There is a clearly defined object in this picture of Calico Camp and its rough miners. There's a young scamp in the story, an absolutely worthless fellow. They are going to run him out of camp, when his mother comes. They respect her worth so much that they give up some of their most precious treasures to keep her from knowing what a blank-number her son is. The scamp dies and his mother sorrowfully packs up "her son's things." He had nothing. The miners own these and they watch her pack them. It is a very human picture and one worth while. It is well acted.

"Mistrust" (Gaumont).—This is a very dramatic and well made picture of a game-keeper's family on a beautiful French estate. One would like to know what part of France is so beautiful as this in its meadows and woods. It is extremely well acted. The poacher, who the keeper finds him and takes his gun, acts the part perfectly. It is he who, to be revenged, sends the anonymous letter that makes the keeper mistrust his wife. The progress of this mistrust and the climax it carries the keeper through before it is cured are clearly shown and convincing, except that one does not see the reason for the keeper's not opening the door of the cabin before firing. Afraid of poachers with guns, or insane from jealousy, thinking that his wife was inside? It ends happily.

"His Baby's Doll" (Pathe).—This is a film that, supposing it a true picture of what is h manly possible, will be of more interest to psychiatrists and to those whose business it is to care of the insane, than to the general public. It has the same kind of a theme as "A Mother's Distress," released a week or so ago. Its object is to show how a man made an idiot by the loss of his only child is a few years later cured by being shown a series of dolls, of graded sizes, and finally a little girl who is just like the girl who died. It is fairly well acted, though not in all scenes.

"The Rose of Old St. Augustine" (Selig).—This is an unusually romantic story and an exciting one. It is well acted, especially the heroine's part, and though there is a little sawing of the air and theatrical posing in the picture, on the whole it maintains just the right atmosphere to give a delightful effect. None of the beach scenes with white sand and bright sunlight that this reviewer has ever seen have been very effective. There is too much high light and too little background in them. But the Selig Company manages to bring out the fases of the actors very well, even in such cases. The scenes in the old fortress—it was new then—are very commendable, as are the thrilling scenes after Lafitte and the Rose have escaped and we see the buccaneers' ship and especially the short-sworn of the long-going little sail boats. It's a thrilling moment when Lafitte, with a half-dozen of these fast boats, starts out on a raid to revenge the men who betrayed him. The Selig Company has evidently spared no expense in making this picture.

"A Game of Deception" (Lubin).—Cleverness is the quality most apparent in this picture. Just the right amount of burlesquing makes it very amusing. The earnest man and the flippant man will sit side by side watching the picture, and both will laugh with delight, till the earnest man hears the sinner laugh, and then he may be ashamed of himself, for there's a cynical touch in it. It is hypocrisy that is made ridiculous, not things that ought to be reverenced but it is so clever that anyone can easily misunderstand it to suit his own taste. Probably it won't greatly offend anyone; it oughtn't to. Miss Lawrence takes the part of the actress very ably, while Mr. Johnson, in the first scenes, perhaps overdoes his part as the minister's son who is engaged to her; he shouldn't be so awkward.

"Madeline's Rebellion" (Edison).—Madeline, herself, is the life and charm of this delightful picture. Her acting is filled with laughter-provoking suggestions. As cadets, she and her sister are very amusing. The scenes are very well conducted and the picture as a whole is very acceptable.

"On the Frontiers of Thibet" (Urban-Eclipse).—This very interesting travel picture shows scenes and customs of people living on the border between Thibet and India. The faces that pass are both Hindu and Chinese. The film is well photographed and will be a good educational feature.

"The Gaul's Honor" (Urban-Eclipse).—This story of the days when Rome was in her youth is interesting chiefly because of the accuracy of the armor, weapons and costumes. The tale is clear. Many of the scenes, especially the attitudes of the characters, suggest noted paintings. Some of the scenes are very stirring. The last picture is a Druid sacrifice.

"The Inheritance" (Edison).—This well-acted farce tells the story of the temporary affluence of a poor florist and his wife when hear that they are to receive part of an uncle's estate—they receive in time just thirty cents. The best scene is the one where these two people are at dinner; their manners are not so distinguished as their surroundings, and they disgust their servants. It is an interesting study, humorous and well told; but very like such a story as one would tell in a few words as a anecdote after dinner.

"The Infant at Snakeville" (Essanay).—Here is a Western comedy, presenting a number of funny situations that kept the audience laughing. A baby, minus its mother, who was left behind by the coach, arrives unexpectedly in Snakeville. Broncho Bill is assigned as nurse. Then the trouble begins. Everything the imagination can conceive happens. When the mother arrives, instead of thanking the boys for doing their best, she presents the unpressed nurse with a piece of her mind, vigorously expressed, and sweeps melodramatically away.

"A Clever Fraud" (Vitagraph).—This bright comedy tells the adventures of a number of young people who take part in a mixed-up love affair. The cause of the difficulty is in the girl's profession—she is an actress and the aunty objects. At a reception given by the aunt, the actress impersonates a young man and charms the girls and the aunt as well. After funny scenes the picture ends with the aunt approving that Nellie is a proper match for her nephew. This comedy has a sparkle and life that is delightful. The actors perform their parts quite as they would in real life and the audience is kept highly amused throughout the length of the film. It has no weak places.

"Where There's a Will There's a Way" (Selig).—This is a comic vaudeville. In the first scenes there is so little detail in the picture that one can hardly see the faces clearly. Then the two judges, who dislike the young men who are "paying attention" to their respective daughters, are too much alike in the way they show it. The truth is that it is a rather dull picture, though it is amusing where Judge Holt swears in one of the young men and makes him promise not to tell the little secret which would make both judges ridiculous.

"A Rough Diamond" (Pathe).—The hero of this worthy story is a poacher. Its background is a beautiful German estate. It tells how the poacher came to be offered a job on the estate. It is a sentimental story of country life, clearly told, with no harsh action or tragic episodes and has a happy ending. The acting is natural and convincing. It makes a commendable film.

"The Scorpion" (Pathe).—This interesting and instructive film shows the habits and nesting places of that poisonous little creature, the scorpion.

"Loyal Love" (Pathe).—Here is a home drama showing how a married couple almost lost their happiness through a silly mistake. Because it tells a story of the heart, it touches the emotions and that feature makes it interesting.

"A Smile of a Child" (Biograph).—Here is illustrated the influence of the smile of a child. It makes an ill-natured prince pleasant, and later saves its mother. The story is not so importnt as the smile. That and the saucy wink which accompanies it has an intectious quality which radiates even from the screen and arouses good-natured feelings in the minds of the audience. Because of this indefinable, but perfectly apparent, quality, the picture impresses the audience very favorably.

"The Feud" (Lubin).—Here is a good love story built up around a feud. The young people meet through an accident, fall in love and after some vicissitudes are married. The most exciting moment is when the girl's father in his dying moments undertakes to shoot the young man down. As he falls back dead, the young people go away. The girl is warmly welcomed by the young man's mother. His father holds out long, but she wins him over, too, and the minister completes an interesting story.

"The Sardine Industry" (Lubin).—This short industrial tells the story of the sardine from the time it is taken in the nets until it reaches the table. The fishing and canneries are picturesque. All scenes are interesting and instructive.

"Nitrate of Soda" (Selig).—This industrial film illustrates the great nitrate fields of Chili from which is taken the bulk of the world's supply. The first scene is a spectacular blast; then follow scenes showing how nitrate is dissolved in water and the water evaporated. This film needs a lecturer; few know enough about the subject to understand much about the pictures.

"Montana Anna" (Selig).—The Anna of this very pleasant Western story has a straight-forwardness and a "fetching" way that makes her a delightful heroine. The love story is clear and very well acted. It is probable and there is nothing displeasing about it. It is very commendable.

"His Friend's Wife" (Essanay).—There is a clearly pointed moral in this story of an artist and a flower girl whom he marries. It's a story, not a drama, and its most commendable quality is pictorial beauty. The artist dresses in the exaggerated way and, as is implied lives the exaggerated life; three weeks after he marries the flower girl he tires of her. She gets a divorce and marries his friend. His meeting with her at his friend's rooms is dramatic. In the next scene he dies of heart disease, and the closing picture shows the great happiness of the friend and his wife.

"The Cardinal's Edict" (Edison).—Twice within a little more than a year Bulwer Lytton's drama "Richlieu" has been produced in moving pictures; the first attempt was by the Vitagraph Company. The Edison version follows the drama less closely and less clearly. It is both free and hasty. A tendency to "play up" to well-known paintings is to be commended. The first few scenes are pleasing, and call for some striking finales. Indeed, the settings were most probably taken from the famous picture "La Marseillaise Grize." The cheap artificial scenery in the dwelling scene was quite an anti-climax. The sudden violence of the cardinal's wrath upon the return of the lover, who has succeeded in securing the queen's written proof of the plotting against him, is hard to understand. There seems to be nothing in the drama to warrant it. It is suggested with all due deference that the drama itself—I mean Bulwer Lytton's work—is not ordinary and is fully exhausted after one superior company has given it a representation in films. A second attempt, unless it is a very decided improvement, seems like a waste of energy.

"For Her Brother's Sake" (Vitagraph).—This coherent story is quickly and intelligently told. To shield a brother who has fallen into evil ways, a young woman risks the love and esteem of her husband and her own happiness besides. A death-bed confession breathed into the ear of the saddened husband, while he is on duty in a hospital as a physician, reveals the truth and draws to the husband the sacrifice his wife made for the sake of her weak and erring brother.

Independent.

"Bridget, the Flirt" (Selig).—It is a horse-play farce, but it is very funny. It's rough, but we wouldn't call it coarse. It kept the house laughing.

"The Minute and the Maid" (Reliance).—This is another of Thanhouser's gestures of strong life. It is sensational, but more real than such plays as "The Conflict" or "The Invader," recently released by the company. There's much good to it. The model is ill treated by her father; the artist finds the girl he loves outside the model comes to the studio for protection from her drunken father, and the artist, to save her, marries her and finds happiness. It is well acted and interesting. Reliance stories are always clear, and that is the best quality in every good picture.

"The Human Tiger" (Ambrosio).—This is an intensely interesting picture. It depends for power almost wholly on the acting of one player (the human tigress) who capably creates the impression that if she is crossed in her purpose something very distressing indeed will happen. She does this almost wholly by facial expression. The impression is maintained with much skill, both by the actress and by the producer who arranged the lighting and accessories, especially at the climax, when the tigress, candle in hand, is making her way from room to room towards her victim's apartment. But the denouement is quite inadequate. She sets the apartment on fire; anyone could have done as much, even with only half her capabilities. We don't see the victim die; we don't know how many victims there are. When the lover and the tigress are seen again, it is with surprise, as for a moment we thought the tigress was the other woman, who was buried, as we know later, for we are shown her grave.

"Two Good Friends" (Ambrosio).—The friends are a very young puppy and a parrot. The parrot is badly mauled, but takes it philosophically, as it is plain that the two are very good friends, but the puppy gets more than one feather.

"The Sheepman's Daughter" (American).—Here is a film that reproduces graphically the feud between the cattlemen and the sheepmen on the Western ranges. This is a sheepman's story and against the cattlemen. Perhaps the novels that have dealt with this subject have mostly looked at it from the opposite side. It's well to see both sides of any question. The novelty in this picture is the minister who befriends the girl, overhears the plot of the cattlemen to find her father and murder him. The minister and the girl make a thrilling ride to the sheepman's refuge and arrive in time to save him. At the muzzle of his gun the minister preaches the cattlemen a sermon that saves the sheepman's life. Perhaps it is unnecessary to add that he gets a wife. The setting is interesting, and the story will be new to a majority of those who will see it.

"The Savage" (Nestor).—Here is a Western picture from the Nestor house, with plenty of excitement, including a quarrel over a gambling game, a horse theft, an Indian raid, cowboys careening upon their horses, a woman bound to a tree and the wood piled around her ready for ignition, and an Indian led away to execution but saved by the woman, though he dies from his wound. And it is all enhanced by the Nestor photography. The exciting moments are reached in such a natural way that the audience almost feels as though it were looking upon the real scenes. The players enter into the spirit of their parts with full appreciation of their possibilities, and are deserving of praise for the way the situations are worked out.

"A Sure Cure" (Nestor).—In this short farce, an objecting parent, presumably poisoned by chromic acid from an amateur photographer's studio, is marvelously restored by the young doctor to whom he objects. The young people take no chances, however, and hurry away to the minister as soon as the restored father gives them his blessing.

"The Collector's Purse" (Itala).—This is a dramatic picture; but the denouement does not make plain all the results we usually expect to follow sooner or later from a theft. The picture doesn't warrant. We suspect that, in the same circumstances and foreknowing all that would come from it, according to this picture, he would commit the theft again. It is well acted, though the banker's wife talked to the camera. The story is clear as to its main thread. It seemed to interest.

"The Monogram J. O." (Rex).—If this was intended to be a comedy, it is a dull one. One or two of the audience chuckled two or three times (14th St. Theater, June 1st) but most watched it in silence. The story is quite plain. The trouble is in the play, not in the actors. The salesman's facial expression were easily the most amusing thing in the picture, but that isn't saying much. It is a play intended for wit, but without the dialogue the unpleasant quality of the situation which makes a man think his wife unfaithful robs it of all humor.

"The Last Appeal" (Imp).—This is a very possible picture, but only the ending of the story is given. If we knew what separated the man and his wife we would be far more interested in the bringing of them together. In fact, only the denouement is given, without that part that would make it seem probable. Imp players can be depended upon to get all there is out of a situation, but in this there are no characters, just five puppets. They make it clear, but it doesn't interest us deeply.

"Never Too Late to Mend" (Solax).—The background of this picture is the Mexican borderland. It deals with a gang of Mexican horse-thieves and is exciting. There are U. S. soldiers in it, too, and their charging kept a very small boy in front of the reviewer chortling with delight. The flag, Old Glory, doesn't leave an army post when a detail is sent out to chase thieves. To make it do so in a picture seems lacking in due respect. No real lieutenant ever saluted the flag in the sloppy way of this story's hero. The story is very well conducted, and interesting.

"A Tale of the Foothills" (Bison).—This is no sweetly scented story of summer; it piles horror on sensation till the auditorium becomes still and even the candy boy stops hawking his goods to watch again the lynching scene and see if the hero's tongue comes out of his mouth when he is strung up. The hero's wife and child, a little girl, have just bade him good-bye and are standing watching it all. One can well believe that it was quite impossible to overact this play. The hero was innocent, but the hot-headed sheriff must needs string him up. The wife of the murdered man was at hand to admit doing the terrible deed accidentally, and the hero is cut down; but how about the young boys and girls who have watched all this passing on the screen? Has it done them any good? Do we want to feed our children's minds on such morbid stuff as this?

"A Circus Stowaway" (Thanhouser).—Little Maria Eline, as the orphan boy who, according to this story, falls asleep in a circus wagon and is carried away, is delightful, and her acting was applauded by audible remarks of pleasure at the little fellow's doings. More than half of this long film seems to be a circus parade, close to the camera and very trying at least to this reviewer's eyes. The little stowaway is able to help his benefactor, the acrobat, and the episode that ends the film is interesting or is made so by this little player.

"Knows All, Anthropological Doctor" (Itala).—There is much that is amusing and much that is unpleasant in this film. In the first place, we have seen so much marital infidelity of late that, in a comedy, it may be distasteful. Again, pictures of those diseased heads with their tumor-like bumps are unpleasant. Beside these, this film has the usual French "stunts" such as falling into a room and knocking down the cupboard, etc. It made a good many people in the theater laugh.

"In Flowers Paled" (Reliance).—Fine acting on the part of Miss Leonard, as Helen Baer, and Mr. Lang, as Jack Norwood, make this very significant and human picture a film that is worth while. Lovers have been separated as these two and will be again. Weakness of character made Jack, after his disappointment, sink to the social scale of the outcast. His sweetheart was true for years and he might have won her if his fate had been different. Yet, buts and ifs aside, the picture has an atmosphere that, to quote Tennyson, is "wild with all regret."

"With Eyes That See Not" (Powers).—There is nothing new in this story—a recent English novel. "The Rosary," in part parallels it, though the novel is a romance, and this a bit of unpleasant realism. A man leaves his wife for a woman of the fast kind, who leaves him for a man more like herself. The man is blinded, and his former wife, as nurse, attends him and wins his love again. Stories of unfaithfulness and divorce seem to be in season. We're having a very fair run of them. This one is well acted.

"Arnold Has a Good Try" (Lux).—Here is a comedy based upon the fact that a widow will not permit her daughter to marry until she herself finds a second husband. The young man loses a number of his friends in the attempt to induce them to take the widow. Finally, he saves a man from hanging. But when the stranger is shown the widow he takes a rope from his pocket and declares he would rather hang than marry. Here the girl wakes up and declares her intention to do quite as she pleases. The widow faints.

"The Grind" (Imp).—The spectators seemed to enjoy this farce of college life very much. There is a good deal of fun in it. The "grind" was such a contemptible sheepy-head in the beginning that it wasn't a wonder that they hazed him. After a two weeks' practice with the mitts, he found he could handle his tormentors very easily, and it was a surprise. They smoke the peace-pipe with him.

"Impudence Punished" (Eclair).—This comedy of French society is surely a laugh-producer. It is acted very well indeed and its situations are clear and effective. The butt of the fun is a fat, good-natured, but presumptuous "lady-killer," who gets what he deserved.

"Tommy at the Dentist's" (Eclair).—The human nature in this farce keeps it funny. Tommy's tooth was too big for the dentist, even for the blacksmith. The pain drives Tommy along until it gets him into trouble, and then the toothache is suddenly cured.

"The Sage Brush Phrenologist" (American).—Here is a lively Western story, telling how a traveling phrenologist examines the bumps of a ranch owner and his family, explaining to them what they are fitted for. Straightway they begin to practice what he tells them. A series of amusing situations follows. The picture closes with a very funny scene, the professor thoughtfully examining his own bumps.

"The Elopement on Double L Ranch" (American).—This merry Western picture tells how two ranchmen fall in love with mother and daughter, respectively, plan elopements for the same day and meet at the office of Justice Smith. There is fun in the story.

"The Stepmother" (Thanhouser).—This is one of the pleasantest pictures that this reviewer has seen in a long while; it is truly delightful. It is a simple story with love and human kindliness as the main spring, and it is acted with simplicity. The situation is not new, few situations are; but it is handled so freshly that each move in it is a surprise and, from the first, it excites lively interest. Little Marie Eline takes the part of the younger sister most commendably. The whole cast was very well chosen, and the picture in every way is a fine success.

"The Black Heart" (Powers).—This is a powerful story very well told, and convincingly acted. It has the dignity of a truthful picture of human emotions. It is a tragedy, very tense and exciting, but it has an optomistic ending, and the worst things that happen in it are pictured with a restraint that keeps them from seeming rough. It would be difficult to pick out any one character portrayed as better than the others, for all are good, but perhaps the Indian woman's is stronger in its picture of a mother's yearning love. It surely is a remarkable characterization. This picture is distinctly worth while.

"His Lordship's Hunt" (Bison).—This comedy, by the very able Bison Company, like others that it has produced, is clever and fairly fresh. The audience plainly took pleasure in it. At the last scene, there were only a few who laughed so that they could be heard, and the few who did were boisterous. The scene is a trifle coarse. Save for that the picture is commendable. Its characters and backgrounds are very interesting; its scenes well selected and artistically photographed, and it is amusing. It's a story of a lord (burlesqued) and of his hunt for bear. One of the cowboys takes the part of the bear, and chases the lord. It was good sport.

"Just Bill's Luck" (Lux).—A chase comedy introducing the favorite comedian, Bill, in a dangerous predicament, is given in this film. He gets the worst of it and has to run. The motorcycle chase is a novelty and appears to be genuine. It creates no end of fun among the audience and closes with a good laugh when Bill and the motorcycle go through a wall among some policemen, who helpless him soundly.

"The Bogus Governess" (Great Northern).—This is a Sherlock Holmes story which holds the interest throughout. Like others of the series, it contains several suppose possibilities, if you will, but none the less interesting. The work of the actors is quite up to the standard set in previous films of this type.

"Service Under Johnson and Lee" (Champion).—The name of this picture is the biggest thing about it. The story is very slight. It has battle scenes but they are not of great merit, though the scene at the depot is picturesque. The story is of a father, one of Lee's soldiers, who tries to get home to his little girl, who wrote him a letter that was far from consoling. There is nothing in the picture that is really convincing.

WHEN THE TABLES TURNED.—After a strenuous season on the road, Ethel Kirby, a popular actress, was bored to death with New York, its lights, music and restaurants. So she decided to get away from it all and have a good rest. Being of a slightly superstitious and decidedly feminine mind, and having enough money to consult her own tastes, she decided to leave the location of her vacation to chance. She closed her eyes, stuck a hat pin in the map of the United States and discovered that her choice fell upon the little town of Lariet, in Texas. So to Lariet she went.

Now it happened that Florence Hailey had written a note to her aunt, Mrs. Burton, in Lariet, saying that she was coming to pay a visit and disparaging the cowboys in the neighborhood as being rather tame affairs. Mrs. Burton, dearly loving a joke, had told the boys and they were prepared to give Miss Hailey a warm welcome.

Miss Hailey, the niece, and Miss Kirby, the actress, met in the dining-car of the train and were soon good friends. At a way-side stop they got off to walk a bit, and Miss Hailey was left. Miss Kirby arrived in Lariet alone and was held up and kidnapped by the boys, who thought that she was Mrs. Burton's niece. After frightening her badly they locked her in a deserted house, took off their masks and prepared to make themselves known, but by this time the actress had discovered the trick played upon her and resolved to turn the tables by assuming to be mad. Her plan worked to perfection and she had the frightened cowboys doing all kinds of stunts while she held them up with a revolver.

From this predicament they were rescued by the real niece, who arrived on a later train, and it was a very crestfallen lot which was finally introduced to the little actress, whose dramatic powers they had learned to respect.

Young Simon Slade was employed by Morgan. In order to improve the mill as circumstances required, Morgan was compelled to get a loan, and same was supplied by Slade, who was also upon the happy family. Morgan began to drink. And the infuriating poisons sets in. It took seven to meet him at every turn.

VAN BIBBER'S EXPERIMENT.—We are made acquainted with a convict afterwards the burglar succeeded on the day of his release from the State Penitentiary and we see him step in front of a gilt frame Turkish bathroom de luxe fixtures.

He promises not to begin a new life and makes no earnest endeavor to find work. Of course it is difficult as no one looks on his mural to return to his former life.

That night at a club Van Bibber meets a great detective who is looking for a criminal who got away with the records belonging to the mother of a golden haired society girl. Van Bibber's acquaintance Miss Detective shows Van Bibber some pictures of notorious suspects, and among them is our friend the ex-convict, and something in the face attracts Van Bibber's attention.

That night on his way home a gateway in a vacant lot ahead of him is suddenly opened and suddenly closed. This bears suspicions to Van Bibber and seeking an adventure, he crawls lightly to the top of the wall and drops upon the crouching figure beneath. Striking the revolver from the man's hand, he then turn look at him and then he recognizes his face as the photograph which had so impressed him. The man does not show fight, but tells him that he will not go back to the penitentiary again.

He takes the convict to his own apartments and tells his valet to clothe and dress him in some of his own things and when the man appears, his head well combed, he bends him to a great mirror and then from square his shoulders and look at the figure that faces him squarely in the eye. The effect is thrilling for the man sees before him not the convict but a well dressed, good looking man of man in every sense of the word. Van Bibber has proven him to real self and he can never forget it. Then Van Bibber offers to send him West to start a new life, but the burglar declines, and shows the purchase of the girl as his friend. Van Bibber decides to go the whole length and offers to provide him with funds. He does this so far as to give the man the money, trusting in his manly manhood to make good. Of course when the bourgeois woman sees the girl she believes that she has stolen the money for the good courses and not until he tells her the experience and she finds a new something in his fancy, does she realize that the old life of the past is gone and a new one entered upon.

The last scene is unconventional, yet telling in its sincerity. It shows Van Bibber some time later entering a boarding house and passing a group of the boarders are with and a little table. Something in the expression of her and these faces shows that Van Bibber's experiment was a success.

A CURE FOR DYSPEPSIA.—This film shows an ardent prohibitionist who is given a dyspeptic and his attempt to run the affairs of his good daughter and a young man who endeavor her to be his own girl on sundry. The dyspeptic prohibitionist is extravagant, but when he finds the young man coming out of a saloon he refuses to listen to his explanation that he was there collecting the rent and immediately breaks off the engagement. Of course, the young folks are nearly broken and of course the scene of anger when fashion behind the father and his little daughter brings on a violent attack of his old enemy. And then it happens that while the young people are in the kitchen, safe from papa's eyes, discussing their misfortune and trying to plan some way out of it, the idea occurs to him that he will try a wonderful dyspepsia medicine sent him by his sister. He doesn't know that his wife has used the bottle as spice cooking brandy in with the belief that it will be safe from the prohibitionist's eyes and consequently when he drinks the medicine he acquires a series of new sensations and finally a very ornamental jag which ends in sleep. As the young people and then behind the kitchen door when he get the bottle of so-called dyspepsia medicine, they don't know what is going on in the man's mind sees that it will work in very well with his plans. When papa has finally fallen asleep they slip in and the young man substitutes the empty cooking brandy bottle for the bottle of dyspepsia cure, after which the little daughter wakes up her father and demands the meaning of his condition. Of course when the prohibitionist sees before him an empty bottle of brandy he believes that he must have been dreaming or out of his senses, and when the young man appears upon the scene and he and the little daughter of theirs to tell of the murder of what has gone on, he makes the best terms he can with them and consents to the re-establishment of the engagement.

A THOROUGHBRED.—Farley is a comedian and also the owner of a valuable race horse which he plans to enter in a steeplechase against a couple of other horses belonging to acquaintances of his. He is also in love, but as people are not inclined to take a comedian seriously, the young lady considers his affectations of the heart rather a joke. His principal rival in her affections is the owner of the fastest one of the horses matched against his. The man who backs Farley a pretty large bet on the outcome of the race and Farley not being a betting man, is disposed to decline the offer, but when he finds that the girl has put her money on his horse, he is shamed into making a wages much larger than his means enable to warrant, even though he is pretty sure that his horse can win.

A few days later while at practice on the field, the rival discovers that Farley's horse is decidedly dangerous to his chances of winning and he in sinuates his groom to bribe the stable man and give him a little something to "doctor" the horse. Of course Farley's horse out of the running.

Farley's jockey, the only one who can ride his horse, learns the facts and watches the stable man and catches him as he is about to administer the "dope." He knocks him down and discovers the jockey's arm is put out of commission and Farley is thus left with a horse, but no jockey capable of riding him. Not being afraid of a man of size, the comedian decides that he will simply put on his own and as the girl has rather laughed at him, regrets that he has not taken the chance.

A COMEDY OF UNDERSTANDING.—The entire action of this comedy occupies itself with the feet and lower extremities of the characters and the entire story is told by what they do. There are all kinds of feet in the picture from the pretty sheik girl to the street urchin, and from the stout washlady to the able-bodied police officer. There is also a little eloping couple who is pursued by a relentless mamma. And there is a puddle in the foreground which reflects most of the action and which is useful to the lovers in their final escape.

ESSANAY.

THE TRIBE'S PENALTY.—Dorothy Storme, the daughter of a white settler on the West, misses her home one day for a ride on horseback in the vicinity, but on the way is intercepted by a party of Indians who, after a hard chase, capture her and bring her to the village, being her before the chief. Admiring the girl's beauty, the chief decrees he will make her his bride and orders Gray Dog to take her to a lodge and guard her. As a result the girl wisely pleads with Gray Dog to go back to his people and is finally forced into the tent while four friends of guard outside. At night Gray Dog, creeping under the cover, is awakened suddenly by a rustling in the grass. A dagger above a human outline descends and wounds and bleeding over his head, stings him on the wrist. With a fierce yell Gray Dog springs to his feet and, handling, staring out of her tent, sees the red eyes reptile crawling away. Instantly realizing what has happened she gets the dagger and, pressing out the blood and poison, bandages the red made wounded arm, thus winning the admiration and gratitude. Later he seeks the tent of the girl's good pet and tugs out she sent home to his people. But the chief and Gray Dog eager trusting Gray Dog sends another of his young men to watch the maiden. Gray Dog has been rendered powerless by the girl's action in fight with the red guard takes the girl away. At the white man's house Gray Dog is persuaded to remain and fall desperately in love with the white girl. His hopelessness is made apparent to him, however, when he finds the girl in a white man's arms and in disgust Gray Dog resolves to return to his people and receive his punishment for his treachery to the tribe. The chief orders him tortured and humiliated to the squaws of the tribe and is then dragged off to the stake where he heroically sustains his life.

SHE GOT THE MONEY.—On her way to her husband, from whom she has been separated for some months, Emily Edwards finds herself stranded in a strange town. Wiring her husband for money that she runs out, refusing to go home to him, she seeks lodgings at a fashionable hotel. Arriving and settled over her affairs she at once exercises the hotel proprietor in a suspicious way. He has summoned the bellboy to keep his eye on the woman. In her room she unpacks her grips and brings out a fan, the handle of which resembles a revolver. She then writes a few letters and asks the bellboy to mail them. As he mails them and then opens a scrap of crumpled paper, which Mrs. Edwards has thrown on the floor and reads: "Dear Mother. Unable to endure further separation from Jack have resolved to elope. The sentence is chopped off here by a blot on the paper. Remembering the revolver which the woman had, the bellboy immediately concludes that the woman is going to blow her head off and summoning the proprietor, the two go to the room, this time both for the room upstairs. The proprietor thinking he is saving the reputation of the hotel, bursts the revolver open and finding it empty orders the woman from the hotel. Later, he learns how badly he has been stung when he pulls open the revolver to find it is nothing but a money box.

THE CAT CAME BACK.—Billy Bowler is alone in his room, trying to sleep, but is having a difficult time of it, for the cat is on the roof and on the back fence outside. He reaches down under his bed for a shoe, minds he carefully aims at the fence distance of his sweet disposition which, though it misses the mark intended for it, strikes his pal, Jack Wilson, who is just emerging from the window. Later the two boys capture the cat, put it in a bag and resolve to immediately dispose of it. The cat lands on a passing boat on the roof and is taken away by the boat captain's son. Bowler goes to buy a cow but having his old cat sent home to a pal has. The boat with the cat and the two boys, switch bundles, which, of course, just when the boy ordering the cat is delivered to him, and they are found in a quiet game of poker. With the bag on the table beside them the contents of that game, which little suspects, soon get on to them. Thinking he was receive him to bring more to the game when back they sees the cat. Bowler, who keeps about until the boy gives another bag, attacks attempts the attendant of both, opening it the cat jumps out after a running fight around the room, the cat is captured at the rear entrance of Bill's new hat, which had been used by Jack in trying to capture the obstreperous feline.

One day, old man Higgins, prompted by his ire, painted a sign and nailed it on a tree. The sign read, "Death to any Judson found on the north side of this tree."

Old man Judson, when seeing this sign, promptly went home and painted another, which read, "Death to any Higgins found on the south side of this tree."

Now, Cupid was mixed up in this deal too. For Higgins' son was engaged to Judson's daughter and Judson's son was engaged to Higgins' daughter. When the four lovers saw the signs they planned to trick their respective parents into ending the feud.

Fresh Judson and her brother John stepped into their father's room, took his sweater from the lodger while he was asleep and replaced the buckets with blank cartridges.

Bess Higgins and her brother Walter did the same to their father. When the two men met by the field on the tree and shouted the usual words, each other, they were quickly disgusted with their poor marksmanship. After a severe battle they separated.

Higgins returned to his cabin to find his wife's rest by the four lovers who confessed having at the feud. Mrs. Higgins was very strong in her disapproval against Judson. He consented to half way and was met by Higgins, who just got over disappointment in his marksmanship.

Then shook hands, pulled down the sights and them all course. There was a double wedding.

THE REDSKINS COWBOY—[illegible]

IMP.

THE FORTUNES OF WAR.—In response to Lincoln's call for troops, at the outset of the Civil War, Bill and Jim Craig leave for the front with the colonel and band. Before they depart Bill bestows upon an affectionate farewell of their mother and sisters, Louise and Anna. Their regiment is encamped in Northern Illinois and the soldiers march away with buoyant spirits and with loyal hearts.

The story reverts to the front, after a battle scene, within the Union lines, the brothers in the country of the enemy. They are doing picket duty, stationed on an outpost. They meet at the end of their respective beats and Bill, loyal and brave, is obsessed with rage and grief. Forgetting everything else in the knowledge that his brother has fallen, he dashes ahead, and before Jim's brave countenance take

He went to the desk from which her ship had sailed, and gazed down in the cool depths. There was oblivion. On land was only sorrow and remorse. He was about to leap overboard when he heard excited cries. Looking up he saw some people landing from a ship nearby. One of them was his daughter—to him it was a vision. But he decided to appease anyway.

It was a vision, but a living, loving daughter, who flung herself into his arms, and rained kisses upon him. Her husband was with her. They had been rescued after a harrowing experience in an open boat at sea.

They did not have a chance to ask the father's forgiveness. He humbled himself to them and sheepishly asked them to accept his love. He realized that his tragedy was due to him and him alone, but determined that the lesson he had been taught would never be forgotten, and that he would do his duty to the man who risked their lives to bring him wealth and never count the cost when human lives were at stake.

FOXY GRANDMA.—To all outward appearance she was simply a quiet old country woman, but looks are deceiving. Actually she was well-to-do, but resided in the country from choice. And the one person she deeply deeply loved was her grandaughter, who made her home with her.

The girl went to the city to meet some snobbish relations. The latter decided to do her a good turn, especially as it would annoy them if it went. They arranged a marriage between her and a young lawyer friend. They had the best of the girl's future prospects, and he was convinced that he could use the money in his business. And there would probably have been a marriage had it not been for Foxy Grandma.

But she decided to put this unexpected spoke in the lawyer. So grandma went to the city arrayed herself in fine clothes after taking a suite at an expensive hotel, and managed to meet the broker on the plea of wanting to invest in securities. She had lots of money, and the broker needed it. He figured that the girl was more or less of a specimen, as she might or might not get a fortune, but that the other woman had the cash. Grandma carefully kept the relationship from him, and he did not even know that she was acquainted with the girl. Which is why he finally decided to be an old woman's darling.

Grandma lured him down to the country exposed his membership before the responsible eyes of the girl, and ordered him away. Then with a sigh of relief, she put away her fine clothes, arrayed herself in her simple garb, took up her knitting, and became the plain old grandmother again.

AMBROSIO.

THE HUMAN TIGRESS.—Alice and Elsie are rivals for the affections of Harold, and when Elsie's wedding is announced, Alice is filled with deep hatred. She plots, and her malignant thoughts are intensified by the sight of the happy couple. Awaiting her opportunity, she steals to the bride's chamber in the middle of the night, and, with the room on fire, she escaping undiscovered, while Elsie perishes. A year elapses and Alice calls into play all her wiles and coquetries, and finally succeeds in leading Harold to the altar.

BISON.

A CHILD OF THE RANCHO.—Maddened by his rebuff at the hands of Nell, his sweetheart Bob, the swagger Mexican follows the girl into a lonely woodland spot, and attempts to force her to elope with him at the point of a gun. Her screams are heard by her little sister, Dorothy, who jumps on the back of the Mexican's spirited horse to ride for aid. The animal becomes frightened and gallops madly away. The terrified child screams for help, and a cowboy snatches her from the horse while going at fearful speed.

In the meantime Nell has seemed the upper hand upon her love-crazed swain. Pointing him and crying out, "Don't shoot!" she tricks the Mexican into dropping his gun. He then springs up and aims at his head. In this position she holds him at bay until the arrival of the rescuing party of cowboys. The frightened Mexican attempts to escape, but the unerring burst tightens around him and jerks him back to face well deserved punishment for his impertinency.

HIS LORDSHIP'S HUNTING TRIP.—Lord Westcliff arrives on the ranch with letters of introduction, and is royally treated. His attentions to Ruth, the rancher's daughter, are positively resented by Hank, an ex-cowboy, and four times he tackles the Englishman, but is each time worsted. A shooting trip is arranged and the party leaves on the woods. Dick discovers a fine grizzly and the hunters are separated from his companions. Guns and knives and fingers proceed to the proper place when the bear puts on his savage mien and attempts to hug the lordship, but happily the animal is captured and taken to cover by the lord and the hunters. The bear is then shot, and is mounted and made into a rug. Lord Westcliff is lucky another time, for instead of his head, the bear's claws come in contact with his head. The lord flies to the life saving station, and with the help of the lifeguards, he is rescued from the end of a harpoon and the wounds bound with his neck and two tight as ornaments. In the middle of Englishman's face is a long and painful forgotten reminder always with him. In a twinkling of an eye it spoils the good looks and leaves there mark in the back of the cowboy, who bears it with pain, and ignominiously runs away. The bear is further captured and taken to the ranch, presently, to the lordship expressing his wish that they followed the bear, and decided it dead. The cowboy, in answer, pulls and tempting to be shown until his sweetheart betrays him at once proves upon which he meets his merciful ambush.

THE TWINS.—

GREAT NORTHERN.

HOTEL THIEVES.—We see the hotel thieves at work in a variety of ways, but the following is the latest. The thieves, a man and a woman and in front, during the absence of the woman, robs the room. The accomplice, however, comes before the woman returns. In a house to which Holmes is taken to recover, he has to escape to the roof, past an awaiting police squad taken place. He traces the thieves to Saratoga and recovers by a struggle with the accomplice on the latter during the combat, falls over a cornice.

POWERS.

A CONCERT HALL ROMANCE.—Mr. Winters a banker goes to a concert hall and among the singers there appears a pretty girl whose seems with grace and embarrassed over her position, as she is appearing for the first time. The audience applauds but all is dropping and upon which the manager reconciling disadvantages use.

The banker feels sorry for the girl takes her with time. As years pass, he finds for her musical education and before long she becomes a famous singer.

The banker turns in business and loses track of the girl. One day the now famous singer, while at a restaurant recognizes in a waiter the banker who paid for her education. She insists on his leaving the restaurant with her, but as he feels she is not above him, he refuses to go. In a unique love scene she accepts him as her husband.

HOW WOMEN WIN.—Mr. Braggs is a busy business man who has little time for anything not connected with his day's work. Books, the theatre, athletics interest him little, and the various ones interested and debated by his fellow men interested him not in the least. Braggs frowned on his own blood and some hatred him more than the idea that women should vote. If there was one thing he disliked above another it was that term for Woman, suffrage. He bore suffrage and Suffragettes a deep abiding hatred that in the end so worked upon him as to make him "Suffragist" Every one he had opposed by him a rated Suffragette, to the point that he even fanned his own cuffs to be of that creed.

Knowing that prestige would accrue from the conversion of so notorious an Anti to the Cause, the Suffragettes used hard to their best endeavors to their way of thinking. Tom was decidedly undiplomatic upon their part. Every woman's right's advocate that turned to intervene over hers was catapulted from his office.

In the face of these facts can you possibly imagine that Braggs would finally be won over to the Cause? But that was exactly the sensational of the Suffragettes' desperate efforts, and you certainly find can heading a great New York Suffragette parade a little later. The picture explains everything.

NESTOR.

THE SHERIFF'S MISTAKE.—Tom Hansen felt thoroughly discouraged. For some months he had been out of work, and now his supplies had given out. So should he fail to bring home money by night, Sue and the little ones must go supperless to bed. Perhaps Sam might have heard something, for the good-natured bar-keeper had promised to keep a lookout for him. However he was doomed to disappointment. Sam had heard of nothing, and Tom turned sadly homeward through the gloom. As a group of men at one end of the saloon, Sheriff Jerry Hawley interposed all by declaring that he had been robbed. The doors were instantly locked, and Sheriff Williams, who had been watching them, ordered every man searched. Then, to the intense interest of everyone present, Hawley's empty wallet was discovered in Tom's pocket. As no one had been in the room the said game, that they had not observed Pinto Pete, the half-breed as he slipped the money from Hawley's pocket and dropped the empty wallet into Tom's coat.

In vain did the unfortunate man declare his innocence—the sheriff would not listen to reason, so determining to at least make a fight for his liberty, Tom sprang to his feet and in the confusion which followed, succeeded in getting outside and mounting his horse ere the others could follow.

Then came an exciting chase to his shack, which Tom reached, and although he was badly wounded in dismounting, he managed to bring down Sue's appeal from the window. Tom would soon be carried away, and she should be fed. So passed his men around the place and galloped away for supplies.

Indeed, as night fell, and only the child's pleadings, but her husband's feverish condition, made it imperative that they have water at once. Opening the door, Sue laid up her little one, then as the watchers lowered their guns, she fell fainting at their feet. Quickly the men revived her, and while bathing Tom's wound, when Sheriff Williams shouted up with the glad tidings that Pinto Pete had confessed.

So eager were the men to make what reparation they could, that they gladly made up a purse for the destitute family, and later saw to it that Tom had work.

THE PLAN THAT FAILED.—Tom White was quite positive that Josie Rich preferred him to all other men, while Dick Black was equally sure that she favored him. When a note arrived from the young lady asking Dick to call that evening, and in a postscript invited his chum, Tom, cancelled

Mr. Dick quietly put off the postscript before showing it to his friend.

However, as Dick strutted out of the room, Tom determined that nothing on the floor. He was so quick to see that when Dick arrived Tom was in the midst of a pleasant chat with Josie. Dick, by no means more modest Harry Brown, who, quite unlike the drama, who seemed determined to outstay even Dick's welcome.

Nevertheless, to reassure that they had him in a good game, old man Dick went off to the ends Here Harry hit upon a plan to stop their everlasting wrangling and decide once and for all who was best looking personal.

The lots were to reign smoke, were to be burned some for the girl for Harry escaped from the cab and for Josie, would be the one to steal her. To the extreme astonishment of the three the lots took out one chance all the supposed sensible than fell weeping into Harry's arms. That surprised not longer young gentlemen and her thoroughly upset, to the utter consternation of the unsuitable pairs.

These Two Things

KIMBLE

will do for you if you have alternating current:

1. Ventilate your theater with the least cost, and the best results.
2. Run your M. P. Machine by electricity, automatically, noiselessly, yet with fine shadings of expression.

The Fan

is different from other fans. It runs forward or back, at will, exhausts foul air or draws in fresh air; runs fast or slow, in either direction, and reverses instantly, from any speed forward to any speed back—all done by the mere pull of a cham.

The Machine Motor is also unlike other motors—very much different and very much better.

Like the fan-motor, it is variable speed, the speed and direction being controlled by a handy lever.

Its speed does not change by "steps" like other motors, but by a smooth, even rise or fall, more delicate even than the steadiest hand can do it.

That means expression—art. It also means one hand free to do other work. Both of which mean better pictures and bigger crowds.

Let us talk to you about both of these distinctively "Kimble" helps to your business.

KEEP YOUR DRUM HEADS DRY

The very nature of drum heads causes them to absorb moisture readily, and when the heads become damp it is an absolute certainty that your drum will lose its brilliancy.

Our latest invention, the Electric Drum Heater, entirely overcomes this difficulty, for by its use you can keep your drum brilliant and snappy regardless of the weather.

This device can be attached to any drum and the connecting plug will fit any ordinary 110-volt incandescent lamp socket. It gives no light; never burns out; may be turned on and off at will, or if desired, entirely removed in a few seconds time. Entire outfit, including the Heater proper, two connecting plugs, and six feet of cord, weighs eight ounces—the Heater but two. It is practically indestructible and can easily be carried in your drum case.

Be sure and say whether you wish it for Snare Drum, Bass Drum, or Tympani, as each instrument requires a different strength.

Try one—your money back if you are not entirely satisfied

The Lesson of Success

When a piece of machinery or other article made for service and not for show becomes an immediate success and remains a success does it tell anything of the merit of the article?

Can any machine go into extensive use and enjoy continued popularity if it does not render service that is satisfactory?

If success from its first appearance and constantly extending mean anything to you, you will consider the record of

before you buy a moving picture machine.

In a year after its introduction its monthly sales had become larger than those of any two competing machines.

Today its volume of sales in proportion to those of competitors is larger than ever.

Wouldn't it pay you to learn about it before you buy?

The Edison Economy Transformer Sells On Its Own Merits

YONKERS, N. Y., May 11, 1911.

HARRY A. MACKIE,
853 Broadway, New York City.

DEAR SIR: The Edison Economy Transformer I bought of you is all you claim for it. I have tried several other makes of transformers, economizers, etc., but could not get satisfaction from any of them. The Edison gives me a fine light and steady, and also incidentally has slowed the wheels in my meter down from 23 revolutions a minute to 11, or about 55% saving, with which I am greatly pleased. I am thoroughly satisfied with the instrument in every way and want you to send another immediately as I have two machines in operation and want an Edison Transformer on both.

Respectfully yours,
A. HAMILTON.

The Declaration of Independence

The Most Pretentious Patriotic Picture Ever Attempted—A marvelous Filmization of the Greatest Event in American History—Out Tuesday, July 4. HE'S BOOKING IT NOW to Make Sure of Getting It After It's Released—ARE YOU?

"COURTING ACROSS THE COURT"

RELEASED TUESDAY, JUNE 27

A Suffragette Love Story

Courting Across the Court

is a new wrinkle in film fiction of the love sort, carrying a Suffragette atmosphere as a distinct diversion. A clever woman lawyer wishes to bring her pretty daughter up in that profession. But the daughter thinks better of the profession of wife, especially as she had a choice for husband already made. Said choice was the result of the odd courting the title tells of. So from title to trailer you can wager the reel will hold your interest.

No. 223. Code Word, Court.

RELEASED FRIDAY, JUNE 30

THE THANHOUSER CLASSIC

By R. D. BLACKMORE

When Blackmore wrote "Lorna Doone," neither he nor any of his day knew, thought or even dreamt of the motion picture. There did seem possible to him some things that the brains of later-day inventors gave to the world, but the moving picture—NEVER! Still, from the all-action style of the story, you'd really think he had a moving picture scenario in mind when he wrote it. All the situations are highly moving-picturesque and give thrill upon thrill, as though written to order to make an extra-startling release.

No. 204. Code Word, Lorn.

Vol. 8 JUNE 24, 1911 No. 25

The Psychic Force and Value of the Moving Picture.

The taste of the American public in the matter of plays, amusements and literature is today much influenced by the moving picture. In a year or two, we venture to predict, the public taste will be moulded altogether by the products of the film-makers and thus moulded will manifest itself in plain and numerous ways. This will be due to the unique psychic force of the moving picture, of which these few lines are intended to give a somewhat detailed explanation. The moving picture acts upon the mind and soul (the psyche) of man more directly, more strongly and with more lasting effect than any other known agent for impressing the senses. Compare for instance the moving picture with the book. In the latter the printed letter is the medium of thought transference between reader and author. The appeal to the senses is wholly indirect and the reading requires a far keener co-operation on the part of the reader than the picture demands of the spectator. Moreover, the book paints with words and calls upon the mind to set its powers of imagination to work, of which not every one is capable, and of which even the stronger type of mind soon tires. The picture, on the other hand, summons the imagination not to any sort of labor, but to immediate delight, it gives the greatest return of enjoyment for the least possible effort.

A man, for example, who has spent all his life in the Canadian wilderness, cannot by the finest descriptive reading and the liveliest imagination picture to himself a true image of the sea; a painted sketch will help him a little, but the moving picture with no effort on his part will at once print upon his mind a perfect likeness. The number of books turned out every week is probably equal to the number of reels released in the same space of time, but the picture counts its spectators by the thousands where the book counts its readers by hundreds. When your bear in mind further, that the movable type, to which we owe the book, is an invention over four hundred years old, while the moving picture is too new to have any history, the inferiority of the printed letter as a means of reaching and influencing the human mind and soul is no longer open to doubt.

Nor is the spoken word one whit more powerful than the printed page, when compared with the moving picture. The most eloquent orator has no such influence over the human mind as the simplest picture. Marc Anthony, Shakespeare's greatest orator, trusted to the picture of the dead Caesar rather than to his own eloquence, magnetic as that was, to gain the populace to his ends and purposes. The sight of the bleeding body, more than all the charm and power of the spoken word, set the situation clearly before the mob and acted so directly and powerfully upon the assembled minds that they were stirred to action.

Another point of superiority in favor of the moving picture remains to be recorded. The influence of the picture is under ordinary circumstances far more lasting. The memory of the eye endures longer and keeps its impression clearer than the memory of either ear or the imagination.

Now it is plain that such persistent and powerful appeals to the perceptive and receptive faculties are bound eventually to strike the deeper chords of sentiment and will and must profoundly affect the public morals and the public taste which latter is only a minor manifestation of ethics. Only one institution shares the advantages of the moving picture, and that is the theatre, but where the theatre reaches a hundred, the moving picture reaches thousands and thousands. To sum up: The moving picture bids fair within a year or two to surpass in influence the combined forces of theatre, school, church and library.

What, then, about the vast and growing responsibilities of the film-makers? Here are responsibilities that cannot be declined; they rest upon every man who has a dollar invested in the film-making branch of the industry. Just what may justly be deemed the scope and nature of these responsibilities, how far their boundaries extend, will be discussed in a future article on this most important of all subjects.

The Moving Picture and the Law of Copyright

The writer of moving picture scenarios who trembles lest the wicked film-maker, to whom he sends his precious MSS., will kidnap the child of his muse, may compose himself, for he has the dreaded power of the law behind every line of his work. The stealing of literary property is by no means uncommon; one needs but to glance at the numerous decisions to realize that there is such a thing as literary burglary.

The popular impression that no manuscript can be copyrighted once it has been shown to and copied by others, is contrary to the legal decisions. These latter set forth that even at common law an author had a property right in his manuscript. It may be of interest to the growing number of moving picture playwrights just what legal protection they have a right to expect, and with this end in view brief extracts from legal decisions are here cited.

An original operetta, consisting of libretto, score and name is protected at common law, and an injunction will issue against its use by others, even though the operetta be an adaptation of an old play. This protection extends to every part of a play or manuscript. In order to constitute an infringement, it is not necessary that the whole or even the larger part of a work should be taken, if so much is taken, that the value of the original is sensibly and materially diminished or the labors of the original author are appropriated by another, such taking or appropriation is sufficient in point of law to maintain a suit. Where two authors write on the same subjects and use the same common materials both will be entitled to copyright.

Publication, i. e., the printing or other multiplying of the book, destroys the right of the author to protection by copyright. Publication is deemed to dedicate the book or play to the public and implies a renunciation of copyright. Upon proper legal proof of infringement the law will seize all copyrighted matter in the hands of the defendant and will make him liable in damages to the plaintiff. The defendant will likewise be ordered to account for all profits and will in the event of his failure to make a proper accounting be subjected to contempt proceedings, which may lead to civil arrest and imprisonment.

The simple title of a book, play, magazine, etc., is not subject to being copyrighted. If it is to be protected as such, it must be protected under the statutes regulating the protection of trade marks.

The new copyright law in the United States is especially effective in protecting absolutely the rights of the manufacturers of exclusive feature films for which state rights are sold where such films are leased and not sold outright. The new law is equally effective in protecting the rights of the licensees of such manufacturers. In the case of film of foreign manufacture which is sold in Europe with the restriction that it shall not be exported, and if such film is copyrighted in the United States any person attempting to import a copy of such film is violating Section No. 32 of the Act of March 4, 1909, which provides that all articles prohibited importation by the copyright Act which are brought into the United States from any foreign country shall be seized and forfeited by like proceedings as those provided by the law for the seizure and condemnation of property imported into the United States in violation of the customs revenue laws. Such articles when forfeited shall be destroyed in such manner as the Secretary of the Treasury or the court, as the case may be, shall direct.

Section No. 33 provides that the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmasters-General are empowered and required to make and enforce such joint rules and regulations as shall prevent the importation into the United States of articles prohibited by this Act.

Section No. 25 provides a penalty of one hundred dollars for the first and fifty dollars for each subsequent infringing performance.

Section No. 27 provides that the proceeding for injunction, damages and profits, and those for the seizure of infringing copies, may be united in one action.

Section No. 28 provides that any person who wilfully and for profit shall infringe any copyright secured by this Act, or who shall knowingly and willfully aid or abet such infringement, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment for not exceeding one year or by a fine of not less than one hundred dollars nor more than one thousand dollars, or both, in the discretion of the court.

A Sincerely Pictured Modern Story.

"Tim Mahoney, the Scab," of the Vitagraph Company, has qualities that probably will make it one of the most talked-of films released in some time. Yet, though it is a story of a scab's relationship to his union, there is nothing in it useful to either the strong unionist or to the anti-unionist. It doesn't argue or attempt to persuade; it merely states Tim Mahoney's individual and particular case. Tim is a union man; he is with the union as well as in it; he believes in the union, in the need for it and in the work it is doing. And he also believes in the righteousness of this particular strike. But the strike finds Tim, in spite of union help, if there is any, unprepared. His children are there and are hungry when the story opens, and are going to be hungry three times a day right along. Tim's case is special. We are not shown just what elements make it harder for him than for all the others, but we see that at first he is loyal to the union;

It's a weakness of the photoplay that it cannot tell us plainly all the reasons that there were for such a step; but, on the other hand, it's the photoplay's strength that it can picture so vividly the state of mind in which Tim makes his decision. We don't require an explanation. Tim's humanity is pictured to us sincerely; we see that he is no mean man, trying to get some advantage at the expense of his fellow-workmen. They naturally judge him by their own standards without inquiring into special reasons, if there are any, and we see Tim, in places hard to walk through, bearing up under hard treatment, not only of himself, but of his children, whom the other youngsters, with all the thoughtlessness of children, stone.

The quality of the play that gives it power is the sincerity with which the passions that the situation brings out are pictured. The story is human, and very probable, if not typical; and the players, each one of them, seem to have been chosen because of special fitness to play the parts assigned to them. Tim's humanity is very clearly pictured, and Tim's wife and children carry their characterizations with truth and much clearness. When the works open again and Tim stands at the door while his former friends pass by, five or six pass him, some with contempt, etc., and one looks upon him, Tim Maloney, his old friend who is now a scab, with such wonder that the fact seems not believable. It is a shaft that goes home to Tim's heart. These old-time friends of Tim's are remarkably individual. That scene has not been beaten in any picture, so far as we know.

The film of the "Divine Comedy" or Dante's Vision of Hell, Purgatory and Paradise, as well as the film of the "Temptations of a Great City," are leased and not sold, and are fully protected by the new copyright law.

Common-Sense in the Studio.

By William H. Kitchell.

There is a man in our town who runs a stuffy, little, unpretentious "store show," where for a nickel you can listen to a cracked piano and three electric fans, and see pictures moving. The fans keep buzzing the year round because there is a bake-shop next door, and the ovens are close to the partition wall. And yet with the heat and the fans and the cracked piano, the place pays. There are "open-airs" nearby which take in stray nickels on clear evenings in summer, and other competitors along the same street who do an in-and-out business, mostly "out"; but the cream of the patronage goes next door to the bake-shop.

And why?

In the first place, the man next door to the bakery understands his public and what his public likes and dislikes in the way of motion pictures. Secondly, he understands himself; and being only a plain, human man, he knows that the films which suit his fancy are the kind that will suit his public, and will "get across." He has no use for the other variety. And lastly, having an iron-clad contract with his exchange proprietor calling for a personal selection of subjects—said exchange being two blocks from his "store show"—he "gets what he wants when he wants it."

No, the last statement is NOT a prevarication. The man with the "store show" is also the proprietor of the exchange; and as he supplies his unlucky competitors with their daily supply of films, it is unnecessary to explain further.

The average exhibitor, of course, knows little and cares less about his photoplays. All he wants is a "catchy" title to stick outside the lobby, and an assortment of films that will hold an audience long enough to hypnotize it into the belief that it has seen good pictures. If the audience files out individually and collectively without stopping at the box-office on a still-hunt for the proprietor of the show, the said proprietor imagines that he is giving good return for money invested.

But be it noted that the "average exhibitor" is making only an average profit on his investment. You don't see many of him motoring to Atlantic City for a "week-end," or racing motor-boats as a side issue. It is the "average exhibitor" who advertises in the trade publications or the newspapers for the sale of his theater, or drops silently out of business without money enough left to pay for the advertisement. Probably the "average exhibitor" is deserving of little consideration from the exchange and the manufacturer. He is the gentleman, speaking individually, who is keeping out of his theater the 60,000,000 and more of people in these United States who do not believe in moving pictures, and who would as soon go into a dance-hall as into a photo-play theater. Unfortunately, he is likewise keeping them out of the theater of the exhibitor who is a walking advertisement of the photo-play as it really is—a refined and artistic recreation for a refined and artistic public.

The last type of exhibitor is the man on whom the future of the moving picture industry depends, and who deserves more than he is getting from the film-makers. We are apt to speak of the moving picture industry as a permanent and stable enterprise. Let us hope that it will be. There is no reason why it should not last forever—unless. Remember the fate of "legitimate" melodrama, and the bicycle. Cheapness pays—until one has too much of a good thing. Then look out for the debris.

Our friend near the bake-shop is getting ready to expand. A case of "swelled head," perhaps—but, anyhow, he is building a playhouse that will seat 1,200 people comfortably—comfortably, mind you—and he will get rid of the cracked piano for a new one, and he will have little use for the electric fans, for he is "going in" for ventilation and comfort. And he will keep on making money, for he is more than an "average exhibitor." He understands his pictures and his public; and the little he doesn't know about both is a negligible quantity.

Listen to him for a minute:

"There are manufacturers and manufacturers," he began. "If I had my way, I'd only buy from the one kind. If I did, I'd have to get along on nine reels a week; and I keep open Sundays. As it is, in my capacity as exchange proprietor I buy 'em all. I use what I want in my own photoplay theater, and the rest I send round to my competitors. The joke of it is, they don't seem to recognize the difference.

"Despite alleged inside public opinion, the public likes an educational picture. Not too many at once, not too long, and the right kind. It has no use for Spanish waterfalls, and for simple scenery in which nothing happens and nobody does anything. The average human being will tire of natural scenery in several seconds less than two minutes, and it is more tiresome to look at a filmed representation of a section of landscape than at a real one. A 350-foot educational is not a photograph, but a collection of 5,000 photographs, more or less; and if I was an educational camera man, I'd make something happen on each photograph.

"And melodrama. Melodrama is as dead, as far as popularity goes, as Judas Iscariot; and yet certain picture manufacturers turn out little else. If you study a photoplay audience, you'll notice a bored, I-don't-care-if-I-fall-asleep expression steal over it when a melodrama jiggles on. You know the type. The villain, and the unlucky but honest hero, and the cold father who gets into financial entanglements with the villain, and the heroine—and you know how it winds up. Machine-made, machine-played—and junk! Yet, some manufacturers shove several through the studio mill every month, and the public gets the result.

"But these are not so bad as the photo-plays without a climax, or where the climax comes in the wrong place. There are plenty of them being ground out to-day, and nothing is responsible for them so much as lack of common-sense in the studios. If a scenario is badly acted in spots in the taking, or a section of the negative is ruined in the developing, it seems to be the practice with some manufacturers to cut out whatever is spoiled and send the rest to the exchanges.

"The worst of all, however, are the plays which end unhappily, or are unnatural. To the devil with both! There is enough tragedy in life without running it into the pictures; and most of us get enough tragedy in the morning newspapers, especially when the home team loses in baseball. If a man is known by the films he manufactures, more than one motion-picture capitalist was born in a morgue and has camped out ever since in some backwoods graveyard.

"And I remember a film released by a well-known Licensed maker a few months ago. Country setting, with the girl, the aged parent, and the rural sweetheart. Enter a city 'swell' in a motor-car, with the usual result—in drama. The girl rides away with the 'sport.' And imagine! The old man and Jim stand pensively at the gate, waiting with Long Island simplicity for the return of the foolish one, while darkness falls and midnight comes and the morning. Jim didn't even 'phone to the police. All night at a gate, and when morning came they were still in the same position! Stiffened by rheumatism, probably. Finally, the girl comes back, cured, and Jim takes her back gladly and the old engagement is "on." A story of this type may be 'high-brow' stuff, and Art; but it is sure lacking in common sense.

"If the moving picture business is going to be anything more than a fad, or a filler in between rotten vaudeville, there will have to be some tall hustling in the editorial department of the picture studios to keep up to date with the demand for new and natural plots for photo-plays. The photographic and dramatic end of the industry has shown wonderful improvement during the past two years; but the editorial departments are going so far backward that they are renovating melodramas that have been shelved for a decade, and there is something lacking at the top. I'd call it 'common sense.'"

And the man next door to the bake-shop knows.

Avoidable Crudities.

C. H. Claudy.

Contradictions abound in the art of the stage, both acting and setting. The natural face looks pale and drawn behind the footlights the made up face, which is beauty itself in the play we see, would be ridiculous off the stage. Scenes which appear across the footlights to be life itself, in a drawing room would be distinctly "stagey" and never a stage manager but what has used a light which never was on sand or sea to produce imitations of moonlight which delight the audience.

On the other hand, there are many things which no well trained stage manager will permit to happen in his productions things innocent enough in themselves, but vital in that they may draw a laugh at the wrong time, or break the spell "spoil the picture" as the actor puts it. These are not the things which are in themselves unnatural—as mentioned above—but those which seem unnatural to the audience—which force themselves upon the attention of the onlooker and make him, whether he will or no, realize that this is not a life he is seeing, but a play—not a picture, but a dash.

But the first-class producer of a carefully staged play is far and away ahead of the careful stage manager of a motion picture play. To be sure, the one doesn't have two or three releases a week to bother with, nor does he have to hurry so much. On the other hand, neither has he the resources of the motion picture producer—he must paint all his scenes with canvass and props—the motion picture producer has always at hand that greatest of all aids to naturalness—real actual scenes, prepared by nature itself. No. II—So there is the less excuse when the stage manager of a motion picture play commits a blunder for which there was no need—less excuse because it is so much the more evident.

Take a case in point and consider Selig's production of "Jim and Joe" after Hal Reid's poem of that name. Jim and Joe are sailors and the little story is of the Damon and Pythias-like friendship between them—of the sorrow of one when the other gets married, of the understanding of the matter by the bride, her kindly insistence that the two shall live in her home, and not be parted, of the bachelor's devotion to the child which arrives, etc. Finally the two pals are caught in a storm and wrecked and find only one spar floating in the waves to save both lives. According to the poem and the title, this spar was big enough to save one life, but not big enough for two, so the bachelor sailor lad with magnificent heroism lets go and drowns and lets the benedict go back to wife and baby. Selig put this whole thing on beautifully—had capable actors, good scenes, and made a pretty play of a simple heart-interest story—and then went and hammed down the throats of the audience that it wasn't so at all—pshaw! Only a picture! For the spar, which wasn't big enough to save two lives, according to the story, was actually big enough to save forty people. It never even dipped under the water as the second man caught hold of it. It was a perfect whale of a spar—regular mast—and to "pretend" that it wasn't big enough to save both lives was so absurd that it completely spoiled the spell the rest of the story had cast over the audience.

Now, why? Why not a little spar? Little spars cost no more than big ones—are no harder to use, to place, to cling to to leave go of. There was no question of convenience or easy work or anything like that—it was easier, if anything to be truthful than not. Therefore why this very avoidable crudity which spoiled a pretty story, by spoiling the verarity of the illusion?

This was so glaring a crudity it is mentioned first, but no one who saw the rest of the play and used his eyes, but wondered why the wife used a candle, lit, upon the table in the attic, while making up the bed for Hubby's friend, when there was a flood of light from the window. Oh yes, the audience is supposed to know they are pretending it is night, but a lighted candle in broad daylight is a pretty poor pretense!

Melies had an opportunity too big to live up to, in "The Immortal Alamo"—a subject which deserved a little more careful treatment than it received. One hardly conceives of a commander, informed of the approach of a column of the enemy, so far away they are only visible through field glasses, getting sufficiently panic stricken to send immediately for help saying he is besieged by a thousand Mexicans. One imagines he would at least go look and see for himself! And one resents a scene labled "The Attack," which is so short one can't even look at all of it, said attack being motionless men in a thin line pointing guns at the Alamo! The interior of the Alamo was well done—yet do people stop a desperate defense to go through heroics about a line and fighting to the death? Or do they fight to the death without talking about it? Perhaps the original fighters did go through that line, drawn on the floor, stunt, and agree among themselves to fight till they died, but such desperate fighters didn't all stop fighting at once to discuss the matter.

Miss Storey, with a small part, made the most of it, as usual, and gave a convincing presentation of a woman in utter despair, but she deserved a better and less crude setting than she received—and so did her subject.

Kalem's "Carrier Pigeon" contains a new idea, well worked out—a pretty, reasonable, well played, well acted and thoroughly enjoyable Western drama, with few heroics and rants in it, but one absurdity, for which there was no reason. The hero, who has made an Indian enemy, is beset by Indians while driving the bullion wagon, in which, incidentally, he has a carrier pigeon belonging to his sweetheart, with which he is going to send her a message. The absurdity comes in only having one man with the hero—and he killed or hurt early in the fight. Hero's wagon upsets and he makes a desperate stand, alone, against a fair-sized party of Indians. He makes so good a defense with one revolver that they just ride round in circles, and let him stop shooting long enough to write a note, tie it to the pigeon and let the pigeon loose. They also leave him alone long enough for the pigeon to fly home, the girl to get it and read the note and start a ready collection of cowboys after him, for help.

It is really too absurd to see this lone fighter, in the bottom of the wagon writing a note, and dozens of Indians riding round, not molesting him at all. Had there been three or four men in the wagon—which, as it conveyed bullion, would have been perfectly reasonable, they might have been expected to put up a defense for a few hours. But asking us to believe that many Indians would be held off by one man in a wagon for all this time is asking too much of us—and we didn't believe it at all!

The way people start on sudden journeys in motion picture plays is a revelation to us who have to do it in real life. Why, it takes no time at all. Tell some one to go somewhere for a week, and she slaps on a hat, a maid brings a suit case, packed by magic, and we are off in ten feet of film. No good-bye messages to any one, no instructions to servants, no changing of dress, no gathering of little personal belongings to take with us—never. We just put on our hat and skidoo right along, because there is a stage manager hollering at us—"don't be all day about it—I don't wan't to waste any of this film showing you packing—come along!" Nor need he waste it—a change of dress—a sub-title—are all that one needs for naturalness.

Take Pathe's "All for Money" as an example—a miserable flare-back to the motion picture plays of two years ago it is, too, in which three men try to murder a girl for her money. Ugh!— The girl's guardian wants her to marry his son. So he breaks off her engagement with her lover with a couple of false notes—and of course neither girl nor lover suspects forgery—probably they doubt each other's handwriting, anyway. Then, while she is weeping for her lost love, he tries to thrust her into the arms of his son, who proposes there and then. Natural? Of course. Crude? How can you think of it? Isn't it the most ordinary thing in the world to think of, this asking a girl to wed another man while sobbing for one who has just—seemingly—said a long good-bye to her in a letter? Isn't that a brilliant idea, anyway?

Well, Guardy, finding, to his amazement, that girl won't marry son, anyway till she has stopped crying for lover, follows her to her room and says he will take her away to a quiet place where she can forget lover. Girl puts on hat—maid brings suit case and in half a minute they are on their way. That the "quiet place" is a mad house or sanitarium cuts no figure—in motion picture plays—this one anyway—no one has to make any previous arrangements about things like that.

Whereupon, in said mad house, they imprison girl, try to murder her, and show the attempt, knife, stab and all, and are happily enough outwitted by girl, friendly trained nurse and lover. Most natural thing I ever didn't see, really!

And to complete the crudities, in the initial scene, when girl's father dies on the stage, he forgot himself and swallowed a lump in his throat, after he was dead! Oh, it was a joyous performance, this, though I found difficulty in believing that the same Pathe that has done so many fine things could perpetrate stuff like this. I wonder if it "got by" the Board of Censorship?

"The Fires of Fate," by Vitagraph, coming so shortly after several fine ancient Roman and other films, set in old-time scenes, suffers badly by comparison, in story, at least. Anything more absurd than the Vitagraph winged V plastered against a column in a temple devoted to fire worship and inhabited by vestal virgins and priests it is hard to think of. Moreover, we are informed by the title that the vestal virgins tend the fires, and we see them bow and kneel and worship, but nary "fire" do they feed the fires, or look after it—merely look at it. So one is at a loss to understand why the fire goes out when one poor vestal virgin has a love scene with a young man. Of course, we know she oughtn't to do it—but are we supposed to believe that the fire went out just for spite? Now if she had previously attended to it, or put fuel on it, and neglected it to hug her best fellow, we might understand it. But up to this point the fire burned beautifully and in puffs—we could almost see the man working the bellows and blowing lycopodium through the flame. And it was real mean of him to stop just when vestal virgin wanted to kiss hubby-to-be. Oh, yes, I wot it is ridiculed and coarse to make fun of what was intended as a serious effort, but it was too far below Vitagraph standard and too utterly convincing in details to permit present scribe much sadness over the tribulations of the Vitagraph vestal virgin on her triumph when she fled away in a boat with lover. It was nice to get out of sight of that V-labelled temple, though.

Lubin's "A Good Turn" leaves one with one's mouth open. One doesn't know whether it's a comedy, a tragedy, a drama, or a joke. Sometimes it looks like it was going to be very serious, and sometimes it looks as if it might be funny, and then again it's just foolish, so I suppose it's a drama! It's a lovely sort of thing to hand over to Miss Lawrence and tell her to "do" so probable and all that. Oh, yes, she does it—she does anything they ask her to, and very well, but the art of forty Miss Lawrences can't convince some people (meaning Mutt) that things like this are right or wise or just or merciful or necessary—let alone worth while.

Man, in love, ruined, stock market, too bad, nothing left, must commit suicide. Thinks. Looks at gun. No, by crickets, one more dance with her. Has it. Comes home. Burglars prevent suicide. Tie hero in chair, upstairs room. Greatly distressed, are burglars at idea of man committing suicide. Also more distressed by policemen who sit down on bench in front of house. Wow. House has only one side—no other way to get away save in front of those policemen. It's a moving picture house, you know. Well—bright idea. If girl knows man wants to commit suicide, won't she come and save man, and, in confusion, won't policeman go away? Of course. Man-who-would-be-suicide has thoughtfully left note addressed to Darling Flo, advising her that stock market has made life unbearable, so will die. Burglar, who is a clairvoyant or a soothsayer or something, knows exactly who Darling Flo is, what her last name is and all about it. Hunts up this name in telephone book, gets Darling Flo on the wire—she comes, unties man, love match, gratitude to burglars, policeman go away, man gives the burglars money—happy forever more—stock market to contrary notwithstanding.

But how do you suppose that charming burglar knew who Darling Flo was and all? Wonderful, isn't it?

And please tell me, was this a drama, or is it a comedy—or a joke?

A Royal Send Off.

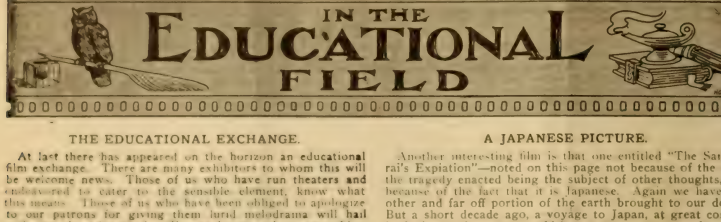
When the elite of the social world are about to cross the pond for a summer in Europe they call a few friends together, have the caterer serve an elaborate meal and spend the evening in a general good time. It is therefore without surprise that we learn the elite of the motion picture business, the Kalem Southern Stock Company, the night before their departure for Ireland, invited a few friends to meet them at an uptown restaurant at seven in the evening for the purpose of helping them celebrate their last night on American soil before their departure for the land of the Shamrock. The litte party consisted of thirty-five, made up of the Kalem Stock Company, a few of their friends in the profession and three of the Kalem office force. After an elaborate banquet which was served, the evening was given up to one of informal enjoyment. Mr. Harold Vosburg, who frequently appears in pictures made by the Kalem Company in the vicinity of New York, gave a happy little talk, at the conclusion of which he gave a reading that those assembled pronounced great. All the various members of the stock company had a few words to say which materially increased the gayety. Mr. Arthur Donaldson, a recent acquisition to the stock company, sang two songs in his inimitable style. Mr. Donaldson was accompanied by his wife, who in turn sang entertainingly two songs. The second one, "Rory O'More," being the name of one of the photoplays the Kalem Company will produce in Ireland.

Carl Laemmle Sails.

Carl Laemmle is off for the European continent until autumn. Mr. Laemmle is president of the Independent Moving Pictures Company of America, owner of the music house of Laemmle, and the Laemmle Film Exchanges and several theaters. In addition, he is one of the directors of the Sales Company and has possibly the largest moving picture interests of any one man in America. Mr. Laemmle will combine business with pleasure and will visit the principal cities of the old world before he returns. He was accompanied by his wife and two children and their nurse. A large crowd of friends and business associates were at the dock Tuesday to bid him a safe and pleasant trip. The studio and office forces sent the party a floral tribute and a basket of fruit in appreciation of the esteem in which Mr. Laemmle is held. Last Wednesday Mr. Laemmle took a formal leave of his stock company, office force and assistants in the musical department at the Imp studio on Fifty-sixth Street, at which time there was a banquet and good cheer. During his tour Mr. Laemmle will look after his business interests on the continent and will spend much time at Berlin, the foreign office of the Imp Company. During his absence he has left trusted lieutenants to look after his business in the persons of "Doc" Willat, the general superintendent, Julius Stern, vice-president and business manager, and Eddie Roskam, superintendent of the plant.

THE "FOURTH-OF-JULY SPECIALS" COMMENCE.

That once more the Glorious Fourth is here with its assortment of highly patriotic pictures, is shown us by the Thanhouser Company's advance announcement of a film on "The Declaration of Independence." We gain from the producer's description of the picture that it also takes up the life of John Hancock, the original signer of the Declaration, and that it depicts Paul Revere's ride and the Boston Tea Party, all of which make the reel very much of a feature in the patriotic line. Covering the many big historical events it does, the picture is said to be the most expensive ever undertaken at the Thanhouser studios.



THE EDUCATIONAL EXCHANGE.

At last there has appeared on the horizon an educational film exchange. There are many exhibitors to whom this will be welcome news. Those of us who have run theaters and endeavored to cater to the sensible element, know what this means. Those of us who have been obliged to apologize to our patrons for giving them lurid melodrama will hail with joy the advent of a film exchange, where something may be had other than what is demanded by the showman of the slums.

The idea of an educational film exchange is sound. There is every reason for its being. There are others to cater to besides the "gallery gods" that heretofore have been neglected or brushed aside by the panderer to dull wit. All that has been written on the subject of scenic and educational films seems to have no effect whatever, for it is still just as hard to get a good educational film as it ever has been. The reason for this is, perhaps, that the educational field, not being thoroughly opened up, some pioneer work will be necessary, and, therefore, the business at the start may not be as lucrative as the general amusement film rental business.

But the field exists; there can be no longer any doubt of that. With churches and schools installing moving picture projection apparatus throughout the land each day, it now becomes necessary to find moving pictures enough to supply the demand of schools, churches, etc., with the proper stuff.

There are thousands of subjects already in existence that would be available for school and church use, except for some one little thing in the film that makes it prohibitive. It cannot be specified what that little thing is, but suffice to say there are hundreds of subjects that are almost, but not quite the thing. To cull these in different films and pick from the mass those that are fit to be seen in schools, etc., it becomes the task of some man or men to do the pioneer work, and it will be a wise renter who enters the field.

The best plan of operation would be not to cater exclusively to schools and churches; but also to cater to theaters that prefer sensible stuff instead of cheap melodrama. The educational should not be adverse to the drama in its better form, but the "knock-down-and-drag-out" should be strictly tabooed. By catering to theaters the field will be somewhat wider than confining it to a narrower educational sphere. There are many, many exhibitors who would be only too glad to get the entire educational output, if they only knew where to get it. But at present they do not, and are at the mercy of the two coteries of manufacturers who force what they want upon exhibitors, instead of studying their needs.

Melodrama forms such a small part of the interesting things in the world that it will hardly be missed. With melodrama out of the way, there would be more opportunities for thinking people to get a look at interesting pictures of bird and animal life, scenics, industrials, educational, historical, religious, clean comedy, scientific, biographical, good drama and child pictures. There are enough interesting subjects in the above divisions to interest one forever.

The educational film exchange is one of the best ideas that has appeared in a "blue moon." It fills a long felt want, and we trust that film renters will take advantage of the idea. If they do not go into it exclusively, at least they could conduct an educational branch, and do some advertising in religious papers, keeping the two divisions entirely separate, and widening their field of business. There has been much talk of the schools and churches owning films, but, everybody knows, this is impracticable in the light of past experience. It may be possible to gather private selections of phonographic records, but with films, that is a different matter and a business in itself.

The moving picture is as popular in Belgium as in London. Every convenient corner of Brussels and Antwerp is devoted to it and the music halls are hard put to it by the competition. The Dutch, on the other hand, have taken less kindly to the new style of drama than their friends.

A JAPANESE PICTURE.

Another interesting film is that one entitled "The Samourai's Expiation"—noted on this page not because of the plot, the tragedy enacted being the subject of other thoughts, but because of the fact that it is Japanese. Again we have another and far off portion of the earth brought to our doors. But a short decade ago, a voyage to Japan, at great cost of both time and money, would be necessary to see such a play as this, in its oriental setting and splendor.

From the fact of its originality, this is a very important picture, the scenery, dress, habits and customs of the Japanese actors form a very pleasing study. The plot being tragical, there is necessarily much opportunity for the display of native ability. In the fighting, some forcible examples of jiu jitsu methods are noticed, while the fencing is especially peculiar in its distinctively different method to that within our common knowledge.

The activity and agility displayed by the combatants is marvelous, while their aim at realism is superb. The uniqueness of this picture is its especal value, as it adds another to that list of pictures adding the value of knowledge to the pleasure of seeing.

SHOOTING THE RAPIDS IN JAPAN.

This is another of Pathe's excellent Japanese pictures. These views of Japan are valuable and the reception of them is most cordial. This remarkable river scene, showing the rushing water in its rapid descent, with the Japanese boats making their hazardous descent, is thrilling. The alert and expert Japanese oarsmen show a keen mastery of the situation, imparting an intense interest to the subject. The shooting of the rapids is a prolonged one, bringing the daring voyagers ultimately to a level of over one thousand feet below the starting point. Besides being interesting, thrilling and beautiful, this adds another to the growing list of educational films which the Pathe firm is providing, and for which the schools will show their appreciation.

WILD ANIMALS IN CAPTIVITY.

This Essanay film is a valuable addition to the educational series and one which will prove interesting and instructive wherever shown. It will be of special value to young people and schools in all parts of the country removed from zoological centers. In addition to showing a good variety of animals and birds there are some unusual scenes never before shown in picture form, these are: an elephant being led into a tank of water for his bath; the manicuring of a lion; extracting the fang from a huge python; bandaging the weak knee of a young camel; followed by the preparation of food and feeding of the animals. Such a series as this is worthy of the highest commendation; it fills a large place in the study of natural history and will be welcomed.

THE PRODIGAL SON.

A new Eclair film illustrating the parable of The Prodigal Son is an addition of value to the list of Biblical pictures. An early view of this subject shows that it has been well prepared and when completed should prove an acceptable series, illustrative of one of the most thrilling stories of life. The artistic and technical work are of the usual high Eclair standard; a detail description of the whole story will be given later; meanwhile we welcome all such additions as this to the educational field. May their number be largely increased, bringing satisfaction to a waiting public looking for that development in this branch of cinematography.

The State Hospital for the Insane, of Warren, Pa., one of the very first to install moving pictures to aid its patients, claims that since the installation of films in November, 1910, the unfortunates have greatly improved. From 200 to 250 patients are taken into the amusement hall twice a week and given a two hours' show.

H. B. Coles.

Mr. H. B. Coles, sales manager of the Nicholas Power Company, has just returned from a trip of three and a half months' duration in the interests of his company. The territory covered included Eastern Canada, Cuba, and all of the United States as far West as and including Denver.

Everywhere he went, Mr. Coles discovered great improvements in each branch of the moving picture trade. The theaters in course of construction are, on the average, larger, more artistic and more sanitary. A great many of the theaters which have been in existence are being remodeled and greatly improved. The exhibitors have learned the value of an efficient ventilating system to keep the air in the theaters pure and of comfortable temperature. A good indication of the higher standard of the moving picture theater of to-day is the rapidity with which the exhibitors are taking hold of "daylight pictures," thus making their places of amusement supposedly more moral.

Much more interest is now being shown in the operating room and machines. A few years ago this very important part of the equipment received the least consideration, but it was pleasing to note with what pride a great proportion of the exhibitors showed their modern, large and roomy, fireproof operating rooms, equipped with work benches and exhaust fans. Where one machine used to be considered sufficient, the wise exhibitor to-day will not consider less than two, thereby permitting him to give a truly continuous show and insuring him against a shut down in case of the temporary failure of one machine. Many of the film exchanges and dealers appreciate the importance of carrying a comprehensive stock of machines and supplies, but there is room for improvement in that line. The exhibitors and operators appreciate a source of supply which they can count on and many of the exchanges would be surprised at the increase in that department of their business, if they made it a point to always carry the principal parts of the better known machines.

The general prosperity of the moving picture business is reflected in the sales of Power's Cameragraph No. 6, which is in great demand all over the world.

The Wagner Film Company, of St. Louis, Mo., announce that they have bought out Wm. H. Swanson's interest in the Swanson-Crawford Film Company, of St. Louis, which is claimed to be the largest film exchange in the United States.

Chicago Debut of Lyman Howe.

The Lyman Howe Travel Festival made its initial appearance in this city Sunday night, June 4th when it opened a three weeks' engagement at the Garrick Theater and though the excessive heat of the past few weeks has wrought much havoc among the local theaters, the Howe attraction is continuing to play to well packed houses.

The program for the Chicago exhibition consists of the best and most popular features of Mr. Howe's library, which is considered the finest of its kind in the world and their projection, with the splendid music and remarkable sound effects is proving a revelation to Chicago's theatergoers. That the program is well chosen, is evidenced by the splendid reception which it receives each day and much beneficial comment, both editorially and otherwise has been aroused.

Beginning with his "Life on a Training Ship, Norway," Mr. Howe takes his audience on to the "Jubilee of all Japan," showing the Little Brown Brother in gala attire, the pageants and parades of humorous and grotesque figures and all the beauties of that Land of the Rising Sun. From there "A Bird's Eye View of Paris" is seen from the Eiffel Tower, and as the voices of the sightseers die away in the distance "His First Attempt at Roller Skating" throws the house into riotous laughter. After a brief intermission "Norway, Land of the Midnight Sun," is beheld in all the glory of its wild and rugged beauty arousing wonder an dadmiration with its beautiful snow-capped mountains and its swiftly running rivers, cascades and waterfalls. "A Ramble Through the Zoo at Antwerp, Belgium," showing the rare animals and birds, the queer antics of the monkeys, is filled with interest and humor while "The Wheelbarrow Race" is greeted with another round of hearty laughter. "An Almost Human Track-Laying Machine" the ingenious methods employed in building the new Grand Trunk Pacific Railroad is received with great interest, as the huge iron monster machine executes the work of scores of men. "Canine Intelligence," the instinct and devotion of a Scotch terrier, brings love and admiration for the poor dumb animal so faithful to his master's interests. "Through Switzerland in Winter" clothed in immaculate white, with its beautiful snow-laden trees, mountains and quaint little villages is a masterpiece of all that's beautiful in natural scenery and is left with reluctance as "Music is Infectious" another comedy, is witnessed. The greatest and most wonderful features of the entire program, "The Late King Edward's Funeral," and "On a Runaway Train" reveal in true significance the real art of motion picture exhibition and the round after round of hearty applause give evidence of the appreciation of the audience. "The Italian Flying Cavalry," "Symphonies of the Sea" and the "Eruption of Mt. Etna" will never be forgotten for they are all that is beautiful and perfection in the art of photography.

Mr. Howe's exhibition is without a doubt the finest that has even been witnessed in this city and with such programs as this his continual success is assured.

ANOTHER THREE-REEL VITAGRAPH LIFE PORTRAYAL COMING.

The Vitagraph Company have secured the rights from the author and actor, Mr. James Halleck Reid, of producing in motion pictures, the successful and famous play "The Confession." Mr. Reid will play Joseph Dumont, the leading character. This drama is most remarkable in many respects, introducing most beautifully and reverently a feature of the church which calls forth the commendation of one of its most eminent prelates as most helpful in appreciating the moral truth it teaches.

This portrayal will be issued as a three-reel subject, produced in the most painstaking and elaborate style possible.

Beginning with the month of August the Vitagraph Company will release two films every week, one military one Western and one straight drama.

The Western Life Portrayal, which will appear Wednesday, June 28th is the first of the Vitagraph's promised Western pictures. The title of this picture is "Courage of Sorts" and it can be put down as one of the strongest and dramatic daily thrilling plays, teaching a lesson of courage and kindliness by the sacrifice of self preservation.

A special monthly release will be made by the Vitagraph Company some time during each month, due notice of which will be given. This release will be in the nature of topical current events of national as well as local interests. The first monthly will present the review by President Taft of the Sunday-school parade in Brooklyn, and the La Crosse game at the Crescent Athletic Club, witnessed by the President.

Lectures on Notable Reels.

By W. Stephen Bush.

LECTURE ON "FAUST." (Two reels.)

Note.—It is suggested that the music and lecture of this reel be carefully rehearsed. The music, if not too loud, will not interfere with the lecture. Those who wish to alternate the lecture with the music will find useful suggestions in the body of the lecture.

Scene 1. Faust in his study. "All the weary years have gone and brought me nothing, life's great secrets are dark as ever. Thus have I turned in my despair to magic's wonders to fire from this great book of Nostradamus the wisdom that explains the world. Alas, it's vain. How vain is the my life surrounded here by ancient books and by the wretched dust of centuries. There yonder vial is the most precious thing I have, it holds a drink, that will cure all—Had you bitter drops, that beckon me to unknown shores, many a time you passed of yore from guest to guest around the merry throng—this is the last, the sweetest toast of all.

Scene 2.—A low and mocking laugh restrains the hand of Faust. Mephisto comes from his dark realm and laughs the doctor's misery to scorn: "Faust, wisdom's champion, ready to despair, this is the foolish mortal's way, there's time enough to die and I will show you that, which will make you want to live." Mephisto hurries Faust to the window and shows him

Scene 3.—Marguerite, taking leave of her brother Valentine who is going away to war. Finish this scene with music.

Scene 4.—The sight of Marguerite has stirred the heart of Faust, his pulses beat faster, he is eager to see her again and with his servant he goes out to mingle with the people at the springtide festival, hoping to find Marguerite. Mephisto transformed into a dog follows Faust and the servant.

Scene 5.—The Faust waltz.

Scene 6.—The dog follows Faust on his return to his study and as he scolds the dog and bids him be still and stop his running and his growling, his jumping and his barking, Mephisto changes back into his own proper shape again, stirs the heart of Faust and brings before his ravished senses the lovely image of Marguerite. (Soft music.) (Short pause.) All scruples vanish. Mephisto urges Faust to sign the compact with a drop of blood. "I will serve you here, but yonder you must forever serve Mephisto." The compact is signed, Mephisto changed in garb to a cavalier urges Faust to come with him to shake off old age, lose the long beard and again feel all the joyous impulses of youth.

Scene 7.—Faust speaks: "Is it here, where I will drop the burden of the years, must I ask counsel of the withered hag?" Mephisto cries: "Yes, this is my monarchy, the drink given to you by her at my command will take off the weight of thirty years." Finish the scene with music and continue the music during the next scene, when Marguerite is seen coming out of church.

Scene 9.—Burning with love for Marguerite, Faust begs of Mephisto to deliver her into his possession. Mephisto protests he is powerless, as Marguerite has just come from confession and is free from sin; he promises, however, to exert all his power. Music.

Scene 10.—Marguerite is followed into her garden by Faust and Mephisto, the latter tells Faust he will tempt Marguerite with priceless jewels. Music.

Scene 11.—In her chamber Marguerite is thinking of the handsome knight, who spoke to her as she was leaving church. While innocently admiring herself in the mirror and singing an ancient German song, Mephisto, invisible to Marguerite, appears and places a casket with priceless jewels on her table. Finish scene with music.

SECOND REEL.

Scene 1.—The second reel begins with the famous garden scene. Marguerite shows the jewels to a neighbor Martha, and while Mephisto in his grotesque fashion woos Martha, Faust declares his love to Marguerite. Music and short pause in lecture. The plucking of the petals from the stem of the flower of love shows Marguerite that Faust loves her and she receives ever cupid's oracle. (Music and short pause.) In the midst of the young lover's happiness Mephisto and Martha return, at the sight of Mephisto's leers and sneers Marguerite recoils and Scene 2.—Leaves Faust and returns the jewels. Music continues up to the title "Marguerite regrets her love, etc."

Scene 3.—Here resume the lecture as follows: Marguerite has been deserted by Faust and now tastes all the bitterness of man's betrayal. She comes to the shrine of the Virgin and prays: "Bend down your eyes to my distress, oh, Lady of Sorrows. Wherever I go, wherever I go, the grief in my bosom goes with me, my heart is poured out in tears, the flowers I bring thee are bedewed with drops of misery, even as the rays of the rising sun struggled into my room, I sat watching on my bed overburdened with fear; help and save me from shame and death, oh Lady of Sorrows bend down your eyes to me and my distress." Note. Where in the course of this scene Mephisto appears, suspend lecture and substitute music. The appearance of Mephisto is very brief, but the contrast between the prayer and the music will be found effective.

Scene 4.—Valentine returns from the war. (Strains of the Faust march.) He is eager to see his sister, but is disturbed by disquieting rumors he hears from Marguerite's old friend Seybel and from other neighbors. He meets Marguerite, assures her of his faith and love. Finish with music.

Scene 5.—Mephisto comes with Faust to Marguerite's window to lure her away. "We will sing a moral song to fool her all the better." Mephisto begins the song, which is a veiled insult to Marguerite and Valentine comes to avenge the insult. Mephisto changes into the shape of the dog and in the duel that ensues guides Faust's sword and parries every thrust of Valentine. After a few passages Faust kills Valentine and flees with Mephisto.

Scene 6.—Marguerite, attracted by the clash of arms and her brother's groans hastens to his side, but is cruelly repulsed. "Stop your tears," cries Valentine, "'Twas you who gave me the fatal stab. . . . I die bravely as a soldier should."

Scene 7.—Suspicion points to Marguerite, she is arrested and cast into prison. Music.

Scene 8.—Brooding over the past, Marguerite's mind has become clouded. She speaks: "To die so young . . . the wreath is broken . . . scattered are the flowers . . . they say I have sinned . . . but whatever led me on was good and sweet." Music.

Scene 9.—By means of phantom horses, the creation of Mephisto, the latter and Faust gain access to Marguerite's prison.

Scene 10.—Marguerite speaks again: "Pity me and let me live, let me live just through the night . . . wait, wait until the dawn." Music.

Scene 11.—Faust enters and seeks to rescue Marguerite, but she mistakes him for her executioner and though later she recognizes him, she cannot realize her danger and after renewing her vows of love, she dies. Faust is seized by Mephisto. Finish with music.

LECTURE ON "ENOCH ARDEN" (two reels, Biograph).
Tennyson's poem has been followed as far as the deviations of the film maker allowed.

Scene 1.—Here on this beach, a hundred years ago, three children of three houses, Annie Lee, the prettiest damsel in the port, and

Scene 2.—Philip Ray, the miller's only son, and Scene 3.—Enoch Arden, a rough sailor's lad, made orphan by a winter shipwreck, had built their castles of dissolving sand, but

Scene 4.—when the dawn of rosy childhood past and the new warmth of life's ascending sun was felt by either,

Scene 5.—either fixed his heart on that one girl and Enoch spoke his love.

Scene 6.—the girl seemed kinder unto Philip than to him, but she loved Enoch and, when she saw them quarrel, she said, as in her days of childhood, she would be little wife to both.

Scene 7.—Then on a golden autumn eventide, fast by the rocky, surf-tossed shore Philip saw Enoch and Annie, sitting hand in hand. Philip looked and in their eyes and faces read his doom; then, as their faces grew together, groaned and slipped aside, crept down close to the surging billows, there

Scene 8.—while the rest were loud in merry-making

Scene 9.—had his dark hour unseen and rose and passed, bearing a life-long hunger in his heart.

Scene 10.—So these were wed and merrily rang the bells and Enoch had made a home, neat and nestlike, halfway up the narrow street that clambered toward the mill. Into the home he brought his pretty wife and all seemed bright and radiant and full of promise.

Scene II.—Alas, there came a change, as all things human change. Fortune had been unkind to Enoch, though there had come to them a daughter first and then a boy, to be the rosy idol of her solitudes, and then another son, a sickly one. He seemed as in a nightmare to see his children poor, and her he loved a beggar, and then he prayed "Save them from this, whatever comes to me."

Scene 12.—So Enoch went to the master of a ship, China bound; the master knew him well and valued him, but wanted yet a boatswain. Would he go? And Enoch all at once assented to it and happily went back to the cottage.

Scene 13.—Then first since Enoch's golden ring had girt her finger, Annie fought against his will, besought him, supplicating, if he cared for her or his dear children, not to go.

Scene 14.—But Enoch prayed for a blessing on his wife and babes and then he said: "Annie, this voyage by the grace of God will yet bring fair weather to all of us. Keep a clean heart and a clear fire for me, for I'll be back, my girl, before you know it." Then lightly rocking baby's cradle, and he, this pretty, puny, weakly little one, nay, for I love him all the better for it, God bless him, he shall sit upon my knees and I shall tell him tales of foreign parts and make him merry; come, Annie, come, cheer up before I go."

Scene 15.—And as he wished she got herself a seaman's glass, that she might see him on the ship as it passed out.

Scene 16.—Annie from her baby's forehead clipped a tiny curl and gave it him, this he kept through all his future.

Scene 17.—But when the last of those last moments came, he cried: "Fear no more for me, cast all your fears on God, that anchor holds, the sea is his, he made it."

Music during next four scenes.

Scene 22.—Annie, when the day that Enoch mentioned came, borrowed a glass, but all in vain, perhaps she could not fix the glass to suit her eye, perhaps her eye was dim, hand tremulous; she saw him not and while he stood on deck waving, the vessel and the moment passed.

Scene 23.—Even to the last deep of the vanishing sail she watched it and departed, weeping for him.

Scene 24.—So they return, sad and lonely to the cottage and Scene 25.—The happy hearth is desolate, for he who was the light and life of all is sailing on the treacherous bosom of the sea.

Scene 26.—Expectant of that news, which never came, she gained for her own a scant sustenance and lived a life of silent melancholy.

Scene 27.—Engulfed in raging waves, Enoch and two others, companions of his miserable fate, after suffering untold misery, breasting the angry waves, at last are swept shoreward by the kindly surf.

Scene 28.—and find here an isle at morn, rich, but the loniest in a lonely sea.

Scene 29.—End with music. Variations of "Evening Star" from "Tannhauser" are suggested.

SECOND REEL.

Scene 1.—Hope and desire still live in Annie's sorely afflicted and grieving heart and she listens unconvinced to Philip, when he says: "The ship was lost, the ship was lost, why should you kill yourself."

Scene 2.—The companions of Enoch have been stricken down, one is dead, the other, his brain pierced by the fierce rays of the sun, is dying. Death is Enoch's sole companion in that solitude, in the fate of his companions he read God's warning: "Wait."

Scene 3.—And in far-off England, Ray, full of honest faith and love, still urges his suit upon the sweetheart of his youth.

Scene 4.—while on the tropic isle the friend of Enoch dies.

Scene 5.—The children, now grown up, have forgotten Enoch; he seemed to them uncertain as a vision or a dream, faint as a figure seen in early dawn, and as Enoch lost Philip gained.

Scene 6.—Philip and the children persuade Annie to cast off her gloom and come with them down to the sea.

Scene 7.—In vain the old search for a trace of the ship of Enoch.

Scene 8.—Enoch, whose head the years had strewn with silver, fancies he sees a sail, his heart bounds with joy; alas it was no sail he saw, but some phantom of the sea and he settles back into despair.

Scene 9.—Philip, patient, devoted, cannot still his heart's voice. "Annie," he says, "it is beyond all hope against all chance, that he, who left you ten long years ago should still be living. I wish you for my wife, I fain would prove a father to your children. Annie, I have loved you longer than you know."

Scene 10.—In his frightful solitude Enoch still is haunted by the babes, their babble, Annie, the small house, the climbing streets, the mill, the leafy lanes, the gentle shower, the smell of dying leaves, and the low moan of leaden colored seas.

Scene 11.—Says Annie to the pleading Philip: "You have been as God's good angel in our house, God bless you for it, God reward you for it, but can one love twice, can you be ever loved as Enoch was?" "I am content," he answers, "to be loved a little after Enoch," so for the children's sake, who love Philip and to avoid the gossip of the village, Annie consents to be Philip's wife.

Scene 12.—What Enoch fain had seen he could not see, the kindly human face, nor ever heard a kindly human voice.

Music during next two scenes.

Scene 15.—So these were wed and merrily rang the wedding bells, but never merrily beat Annie's heart.

Scene 16.—In the miller's home, so much richer, so much finer, than the cottage she had left she knows no rest nor peace, a footstep seemed to fall beside her path, she knew not whence, a whisper on her ear, she knew not what nor loved she to be left alone at home.

Scene 17.—Enoch's hopes to see his own had not yet perished, when his lonely doom came to a sudden end. Another ship in search of water, blown by baffling winds stayed by this isle, they sent a crew, that landing burst away in search of stream or fount and filled the shores with clamor.

Scene 18.—Downward from his mount in gorge came the long-haired, long-bearded Enoch, strangely clad, muttering and mumbling, and making signs they knew not what and yet he led the way to where the rivulets of sweet water ran and soon as he mingled with the crew and heard them talking his long-bounden tongue was loosened, till he made them understand

Scene 19.—him, when their casks were filled they took him aboard.

Scene 20.—while Philip's smile and the pretty home cannot smoothen the furrows on sweet Annie's face.

Scene 21.—To the friendly sailors Enoch uttered his broken tale, scarce credited at first, but more and more amazed and melted all, who listened to it and clothes they gave him and free passage home.

Scene 22.—Annie is still looking for a sign, her gaze still turned to the place where she saw Enoch last

Scene 23.—But presently a new joy made quiet all hear fears, when her child was born, then her new child was as herself renewed, then the new mother came about her heart, then her good Philip was her all-in-all and that mysterious instinct wholly died.

Scene 24.—None of these came from his country and dull the voyage was with long delays, but evermore his fancy fled before the lazy wind.

Scene 25.—Music.

Scene 26.—At last he feels the dewy, meadowy morning breath of England, he spoke no word to any one, but hastened with anxious steps to his home.

Scene 27.—Had he a home? his heart foreshadowing all calamity, his eyes upon the stones he reached the home, but finding neither light nor murmur there, he cried: "All are dead or dead to me."

Scene 28.—Down to the pool and narrow wharf he went, seeking a tavern, which of old he knew; he knew the keeper's widow, good natured, garrulous Miriam Lane, who in his hearing tells the story of Annie's marriage to the miller's son, he hears of Philip's child and how he himself was long ago given up for lost and dead.

Scene 29.—How Enoch yearned to see her face again.

The remaining following covers all the subsequent scenes up to the moment of his return to the inn, but it is suggested to the lecturer, that during the showing of the scenes in Philip's home, music take the place of speech, the words here arranged to be spoken by Enoch will be found amply sufficient to cover the periods, when he is seen looking into Philip's home.

"He now shunned the middle walk and stole up by the wall, behind the yew and thence that which he better might have shunned, if griefs like his have worse or better, Enough saw.

"He saw Philip, the slighted suitor of old times, stout, jovial, with his babe across his knee, and over her second father stooped a girl, a taller, but a lovelier Annie Lee. Now when the dead man come to life beheld his wife, his wife no more, and saw the babe here yet not his upon the father's knee and all the warmth, the peace, the happiness, and his own children tall and beautiful and him, that other, sweeping to his place, he staggered and shook and roared to cheat himself a shrill and terrible cry, which in one moment like the blast of doom would shatter all the happiness of the hearth. Too hard to bear, why did they take me thence? O God, Almighty blessed Saviour, that doth uphold me on my knee by the uphold me, father in thy boyishness a little longer, and one give me strength not to tell her, never to let her know, help me not to break in upon her peace. No father's kiss for me, the girl so like her mother, and the boy my son.

Scene 37.—Turning softly like a thief lest the latest shingle should grate under foot, he crept to the gate and came out upon the waste

Scene 38.—And rushes back to the inn to die. He swears

Motion is contrary and reveals to her who he is, no longer the proud Incas, who held high his head and cared for no one, but Ennery broken and bowed down by the hand of fate.

"Scene 39.— There is not one of all my blood, who will embrace me in the world to be. This hair is his, she cut it off and gave it, take, give him this, for it may comfort her; it will, moreover, be spoken to her, that I am he."

Scene 40.— And now here came so loud a calling of the sea, that all the houses in the haven rang; he woke, he rose, he spread his arms abroad crying with a loud voice. A sail, a sail! I am saved, and so fell back and spoke no more.

So passed the strong, heroic soul away.

By Richard V. Spencer, Los Angeles.

The legal branch of the Selig Stock Company, under the direction of Mr. Boggs, last week was engaged in the making of another big Selig marine film. Most of the scenes were staged at San Pedro, and at Redondo, another seaport nearby. Next week the company will put on a big Indian military production in which it will employ a large addition of supernumeraries for the battle scenes.

The Pathe Company recently lost 1,100 feet of Eastman raw stock film in a wreck on the Salt Lake Line in Nevada. It is believed that the film can be located at a later date and forwarded to its destination.

The Essanay Company left last week for Los Gatos, near San Jose, Cal., where it will spend some time putting on Essanay Westerns. The company worked in the same vicinity last year. It is reported in the local sporting picture colony that Mr. Anderson, the Essanay Western director, is soon to take the company to the Hawaiian Islands for the summer.

The Motion Picture Patents Company's action against Fred Siegert, a local film manufacturer, came up before Judge Wellborn in the local Federal Courts last Monday. The Patents Company's attorneys petitioned the court that Siegert be punished for contempt of court for violation of an order of the court enjoining him from making additional pictures with his alleged Pathe camera, and ordering him to deliver his camera and films to the United States Marshal Youngsworth for destruction. The first hearing of the case occurred March 28th last, when testimony taken at this hearing induced the court to issue an injunction against Siegert enjoining him from using an alleged Pathe camera. It is now alleged by the Patents Company's attorneys that Siegert did not comply with the court's order, and instead of delivering up the films of "The Retribution," "Plucking Chickens for a Bride," "Who Died First?" "Levi, the Tailor," "The Banker's Daughter," "Only a Country Girl," allege that he carried the films and camera to the residence of Henry Fritz, a friend, residing at No. 141 East 33rd Street, Los Angeles, and placed them under the house, in order to avoid the process of the court. The attorneys for the plaintiff argued that the films that Siegert did surrender to Marshal Youngsworth were worthless. Siegert claims that he sold his camera before being served with the injunction. Siegert's attorneys allege that the court order was carried out in good faith, and that Harry A. Kelly, Siegert's former camera man, whose affidavit was strong against Siegert, was, and still is, an employee of the Patents Company, and that the said Kelly had inveigled himself into the home and family of Siegert for the purpose of discovering what he was doing, and how the pictures were being made, with the alleged purpose of later reporting to the Motion Picture Patents Company. The films were produced at Siegert's residence on West Jefferson Street, Los Angeles. After a partial hearing the case went over for one week, again coming up for trial June 5th.

S. Asai, a young Japanese of Long Beach, who is a graduate of the University of Tokio, has organized with the assistance of some experienced Americans, the nucleus of a moving picture stock company. M. Asai, the young man's father, who is financing the organization, is an Admiral in the Japanese navy, and with his son is negotiating for the introduction into Japan of the first series of moving pictures with American scenes, the titles and captions of which will be translated into six different dialects in order to be read and understood in the six different Japanese provinces. Associated with the Asais in the venture are E. M. Dennison, and L. D. Clawson, Americans. In addition to supplying his country with films in the Japanese language, Asai expects, through the influence of his parent, to introduce the motion pictures on board the Japanese men-of-war, for the amusement and instruction of the sailors, and also in the various military barracks of the other branch of the service. The company is also planning to supply coastwise passenger steamers on this coast with moving pictures for the entertainment of their traveling patrons. It is said that this feature has already been installed on several Atlantic boats with great success. Asai after graduating from the Tokio University came to the United States where he immediately became interested in photography. Lately he has taken up the moving picture end of photography, and now, with the help of his American associates, will start a moving picture studio in Long Beach, employing American actors, and producing American stories, later to be translated into Japanese. Later, it is the intention of the company to start a studio in Japan, where will be produced Japanese stories by a Japanese company of actors. These films will be exported to the Pacific Coast of the United States, Mexico, South America, and other centers of Japanese population, to be patronized exclusively by Japanese. The company was recently incorporated in the State of California with a capital of $15,000, the larger portion being subscribed by the Asais. The other members of the firm, which is a closed corporation, are E. M. Dennison, president; and L. D. Clawson, general manager and producer. The company will be known as the International Moving Picture Company of Long Beach, Cal., where they will establish a studio. Long Beach is also the headquarters of The California Motion Picture Mfg. Company, who, it is said, are now engaged in making their pre-release reels.

W. L. Howland, president of the California Motion Picture Mfg. Company of Long Beach, was in Los Angeles recently on business. He says that the company's work is progressing on a sound basis and that the company are about to begin work on their pre-release reels. Mr. Howland has gone to San Diego on business, and will return to Long Beach in about three days.

The Selig Company has begun to enlarge its Los Angeles studio. It has recently acquired a block of lots surrounding the studio, and the buildings on these are now being moved to other locations to make way for new studio buildings. The company plans to spend $250,000 on the Los Angeles plant, making it when finished, the finest moving picture studio in the United States. They already occupy the largest and most complete studio on the Coast. With the completion of the proposed changes the studio will cover the full block on Allesandro Street between C and D Streets, running back to the hill. When the new studio is completed, it is beieved that three companies will be put to work.

CORONATION POSTERS.

The Sales Company have made arrangements with their London representatives who are to film the coronation to ship the negatives immediately. The same reports have reached us from two or three other companies who are going to release the coronation pictures. While in the Sales Company offices we had an opportunity to see an advance copy of their coronation poster, portraying King George and the Queen with their retinue of attendants, being followed by the pageantry, hundreds in number, slowly winding their way to Westminster Abbey. We must admit this to be one of the most elaborate posters released to date, being well balanced and printed in five colors.

For exhibitors who have applied for bookings of this picture, to make advance billings, the Sales Company are sending the posters out this week to all of the buying exchanges.

That the sales of the coronation picture will eclipse any previous feature release is evident by the number of exhibitors who have applied for early bookings, and also the increased orders for posters.

MADISON SQUARE GARDEN CLOSES.

Moving pictures are not going to save Madison Square Garden. Moving pictures have saved many buildings from destruction, but they must be handled by someone who knows the business. The garden management knew little about moving pictures, yet they had certain definite ideas as to how a picture show should be run. No one could give them any advice, so the show closed as a very natural result.

They engaged an expensive ladies' band. Six male musicians could have done more than those twenty girls, at one-third the expense. The advertising was weak, the projection bad and film music awful. A good drummer and a real picture pianist would have put some life into it, but as it was there was no life except a cranky old man walking around finding fault with small matters and entirely overlooking the big ones.

The Camera Man Still Marching On.

By Robert Grau.

It has come to pass at last! Two of America's foremost theatrical managers, men who have for nearly twenty years operated on the very highest plane all over the world, recognizing that the epochal period in cinematography is at hand, have amazed their colleagues by taking part in a fierce competition for the American rights in "The Talking Pictures" now creating a sensation at the Olympic, Paris. These two managers were none other than Charles Frohman, "the Napoleon of the theater," and Colonel Henry W. Savage, an intrepid Yankee "showman," who came into the theatrical business through sheer accident, but who has become one of the world's most important providers of stage material this country has ever known. And it is he who has carried off the prize. Though in his absence abroad, details are lacking, nevertheless it is not to be doubted that a campaign of tremendous significance will be inaugurated in the early fall. For the manager who gave us "The Merry Widow" and "Madame X" and who had the courage to produce "Parsifal" in the language of our nation, and who is about to present in the same language the Puccini grand opera "The Girl of the Golden West," is not likely to identify himself with any new enterprise unless he possesses the ammunition for a successful outcome.

In the very first article contributed by the present writer for this periodical, the importance of the talking picture was exhaustively treated, and in the year that has passed there has not been wanting many indications of a mastery over the extremely difficult problem of synchronizing the expression of the two greatest scientific creations of modern times. At that time Mr. Thomas Alva Edison prophesied that at a not very distant date the workingman would present his dime at the box office of the modern picture theater, and revel in a reproduction of grand operas, plays and spectacles, with a voice, dialogue, action, and even color duplicated in one concrete film output, and now Mr. Edison comes forth, only a few days after the announcement of Colonel Savage's plans, to the effect that the entire problem has been solved and that no less than sixty (60) players were now being utilized in the preparatory stages of the development of the new films. Such managers as Charles Frohman and Colonel Savage evidently do not propose to be confronted with another such upheaval as that which came with the advent of the picture, and their activity is simply an illustration of the triumph of modern scientific achievement and evidence that they bow to the call of progress ere it is too late. Mr Edison, a year ago, was frank enough to express himself as confident that others beside himself were striving to solve the problem of the talking picture would succeed in perfecting the synchronization of phonograph and picture and it is significant that the announcements of "the wizard" and Colonel Savage came simultaneously. Verily, we are marching on!

Another recent development full of great moment, is that which comes from the preliminary proclamation of the newly organized Kinemacolor Company. It is not in my province to treat of the scientific phase of this new illustration of motion picture progress, but it may not be uninteresting to the readers of the Moving Picture World to know the manner of man who is now brought more conspicuously before them as a result of the formation of this new six million dollar corporation. John P. Murdock being best referred to. While no stranger in the moving picture field, Murdock has been more generally identified with vaudeville. There he was a veritable pioneer who blazed the trail in a precarious period. He it was who always brought the warring factions together in the days when discipline and organization were wholly lacking. Murdock was the man to suggest the convention that brought about the association of the vaudeville managers, now surviving under the title of the United Booking Offices, and it was he too who pursevered in troublous days, in fact he was regarded as "the Prince of Peace Makers."

Two years ago this man came to New York to make his permanent home here. His position in the United Booking Office is not clearly defined. He is not an official. His name rarely appears and then only when he has manipulated some momentous deal. I do not know to whom the credit belongs for the many successful coups achieved by the big vaudeville syndicate, but it is a fact that ever since Murdock has been affiliated with Edward F. Albee, the latter has increased in power until today he is truly the undisputed king of vaudeville. This may all be a coincidence and one would not regard it as possible that so frail a figure as J. P. Murdock could be so great a factor on the theatrical map, but he is just one of those Westerners who come to New York every once in a while and just do things.

Will the wonders of cinematography never cease? Only the other day the spectacle of a conservative banking institution underwriting the financial requirements of a vast motion picture concern was on view, while the names of such men as J. Pierpont Morgan and John D. Rockefeller have prominently figured in connection with the operations of men who have enormous interests in the same propitious field. One may not be considered unduly imaginative if he ventures to wonder if the day is so very far off when the problems of this vast industry will be solved in Wall Street through stock and bond operations. This may sound far-fetched at the moment, but I for one would not be amazed if "Moving Picture, common," and "United Cinematography, preferred" became ordinary expressions in the near future.

Essanay Pictures Indianapolis Auto Races.

The Essanay Film Manufacturing Company is fortunate. The recent automobile race in Indianapolis, Ind., which was filmed by the Essanay Company, will probably not be repeated, as the manufacturers of automobiles are reported to have said that such a race, 500 miles long, is too trying for both cars and drivers. The day on which this race was held was cloudless and clear, being ideal conditions for the making of pictures, and it is reported that the pictures of the race caught by the Essanay cameras are remarkably good. Twelve cameras were used in the making of these pictures and they cover nearly every portion of the track, which is circular and of about a mile in diameter, with 200 laps to the 500 miles.

The first picture gives views of the grandstands and scenes about the track, showing parts of the crowd, immense strong, who viewed the race. Then Bob Burman in his famous Blitzen Benz is shown being crowned Speed King shortly after he broke the mile record in 25 45. Then before the grandstand we see the drivers and the cars entered for the long race. Also closer views of the same. Then we see these cars lined up at the tape ready to start. The start on the preliminary lap, accompanied by the president of the speedway. After that the start of the real race and the dash down the home stretch.

Then follow views showing cars as they pass different points along the track. Also several views of minor mishaps to cars, such as throwing tires are shown, and with these the making of repairs at the repair pits opposite to the grandstand. One view shows a tire leaving a wheel and rolling for a quarter of a mile up the stretch. The tire disappears by bounding over a wall.

The worst accident of the day happened in front of the grandstand, a few feet from the Essanay camera. In this three cars were wrecked and two men injured. A complete picture of this was recorded, and we have the breaking of the front axle on the car of driven by Joe Dawson, Gaston Anderson, the mechanician, was thrown out and the car swung in front of the Westcott driven by Harry Knight.

Among other scenes we see Harroun in the Marmon Wasp dash by the checkering flag of the starter, which informed him that he was the victor in the great race. Then we see several views of Harroun and his car, and the film closes with a view of the two-lined showing the nine and the distance run in each of the cars.

"The Little Soldier of '64" (Kalem).

A Patriotic Offering for July 4.

With its coming release "The Little Soldier of '64," the Kalem company strikes a distinct and most harmonious note in the present pleasing commingle of "higher ideas." A film which will give even the hardened reviewer a genuine thrill surely deserves the immediate and favorable notice of the exhibitor. Every element combines to make this production an unqualified success. The excellence of photography is a foregone conclusion with the Kalem Company. The theme of simple, homely, small advantage to begin with. The visit of a young Confederate soldier follows him to the battlefield, and himself, disguised as a recruit, at a critical moment saves her husband's life. This plain, but moving story is set in a most magnificent frame of the time of Nature and Reality. There is not from the first to the last inch of film one bit of artificial scenery. Instead, every scene is acted either in the open or in real rooms and in real homes just as they actually existed and in many sections still exist in the South. This singular charm, so rarely found in photoplays, is present in every part of this film and its potent gains on the spectator with every minute. The very opening scene surrounds us with an atmosphere of historic truth, not in the setting only, but in the characters as well. Such men and women, as are shown, most assuredly existed in the South at the outbreak of the Civil War, such were the clothes they wore, and thus, or very nearly thus, they looked and acted. Local color and historical accuracy in such matters are manifestations of the moving picture art, which are justly deserving of the highest praise. This honest realism, never ostentatious or obtrusive (and for this very reason most pleasing to an audience), is likewise present at the numerous battle scenes that are cleverly introduced in the progress of the action. Battle scenes in photoplays are at times ghastly affairs, unreal in the highest degree, but it here was plain to the reviewer, after he had seen the advance of the deploying lines, that the fighting was under the direction of an experienced tactician. This view was confirmed by the Kalem representative, who informed the writer that all the military parts of the film had been directed by an army officer and were executed by the militia of South Carolina. Indeed, the battle scenes all took place on more or less historic ground in the old Palmetto State. After the hostile forces have felt each other out and ascertained their respective strength and positions, a spirited and realistic artillery duel takes place, and this is in technically and energetically correct order followed by infantry attacks. In a rude, temporary shelter a hospital has been quickly constructed, and the surgeons of the camp of militia which assisted in the production of the pictures are seen working over the maimed and wounded. The pursuit of the wife of the Confederate soldier is a bit of splendid work. The flight in the old-fashioned ferry boat will delight every audience. Such ancient methods of ferriage still exist along many a Southern river, and their reproduction in the picture was a most happy conception on the part of the film makers. The best, however, remains to be told—we mean the touching and patriotic climax. While the last scene is thrown on the screen, husband and wife, now, after the lapse of fifty years, in the decline of life, are shown in front of a genuine old Southern home. Though the bitterness of the great war has died away, both sides love to think of their deeds of valor, and both venerate the flag under which they fought. The brave little wife, now gray and stooped, brings out the stars and bars, and both she and the husband kiss it in deepest reverence. Just as the hearts of the audience are touched with the loyalty of the old people to the cause they fought and bled for, there appears on the threshold of the old home, a little boy, bright-eyed, frank-mannered, lovable at first sight. He carries a small American flag in each hand and, all unconscious of the part the story makes him play, he runs to his grandfather and grandmother, dropping one of the little flags on the ground. The grandmother gathers it up tenderly and with the husband does homage to the emblem of a united country. Never have we seen a finale carried out so skillfully and so naturally and impressively. This review would be incomplete without some allusion to the perfect artistic poise of the picture. Nothing is overdone; there is no effort at sensational turns, not a doit of lost motion in a play where the temptation to be strenuous would have led the inexperienced or inartistic miles astray. There is about the whole and all its parts that suggestion of unused powers of reserve, which is the unfailing token of the highest art. The film should prove a boon to every exhibitor; it must, indeed, be welcome at any time, but as a Fourth of July offering it has an added value. The reel will be released on June 30th.

What Pathe is Doing.

The last week in June promises a very large increase in the death rate so far as Pathe is concerned. This week we were looking over four of their coming releases for that week, and only for one thing we would have come away with a very dark brown taste into our mouths. That one thing happens to be a beautiful travel film entitled "Transportation in Siam." Prior to that there were three other reels. Two of them ended in death-bed scenes and one of them ended in suicide, and we are very thankful to the Pathe people that they reserved that pretty scenic until the last, because it dispelled the gloom that pervaded the pictures before.

The exhibition started off with a reel of film called "The Passing of Dappled Fawn," an Indian story by the American Pathe Company. Technically the picture is all that it should be. The story is about an Indian girl who is sold to a trapper by her savage father, and how she committed suicide by jumping into a waterfall before the trapper could get back to his cabin with her.

The next subject was "The Sublime Pardon," also beautifully acted and exquisitely staged. It reminded us once more of how very difficult it is for two women to live under the same roof at the same time, especially if they are both the same age, and there is a man anywhere around, whether he be married or whether he is own boss.

The good wife takes in her cousin, Alice, who is left alone by death, and in so doing she is paving the way to hell with good intentions. The old-headed husband falls for Alice and after being Renoed he marries his affinity. Alice later dies of consumption. In order to prove it we are given a look at her on her death bed.

The sublime pardon is shown when the first wife receives the child of the second wife, according to a deathbed promise to always be a mother to it. Later on hubby comes back to No. 1 and promises to be a good boy. After making the proper amount of google eyes he is once more allowed to move his wardrobe back to the scene of his crime.

The next subject was an American production entitled "The Step-Sister." In this film Pathes have adapted the idea of introducing their actors and the beginning of the reel with their names, so that the audience may know who they are. The idea was suggested to the Pathe people by James L. Hoff, but he claims that the actors do their bowing at the wrong end of the film, basing his contention on the well-known fact that it is customary for actors to do their bowing at the beginning and have done their bowing before. Which line of logic seems almost human to the present writer.

"The Step-Sister" is a very valuable reel, because it shows a peculiar trait of woman's nature in a very strong and decided way. It is necessary every now and then for film companies to produce reels showing woman's inhumanity to woman, so that the fans as well as not forget it altogether and get going too strong at one another. The reel shows a widow with a young daughter who married a widower with another daughter. Is it necessary for us to say that the widow's daughter got all the gravy, while the other girl got the lemons? She did, until her father died, when it was found that father left the homestead to his daughter and nothing to the others, after which there was a house-cleaning and there was more doing in the inhumanity line. We see father die. Why they did not let him die in peace we do not know, because we did not ask. But this much is true, it is one of the most needlessly realistic pieces of acting we ever saw. Entirely unnecessary and uncalled for by anything except the demands of "art."

After that, "Transportation in Siam" was a life-saver. It was like a hypodermic injection of joy. It cleared the atmosphere like a summer rain and we forgot all about the death and suicide that went before, in looking at the elephants as they swung in their rhythmic stride across the oriental background. Usually it takes a good comic to dispel gloom, but now we are convinced that a good scenic will do it equally as well. "Transportation in Siam" is a fine reel. One that will be remembered long after the others are forgotten. We may possibly remember that last death scene, but what's the use? There is something majestic about an elephant that one never tires of looking at, and as elephants form the principal mode of transportation in Siam, they figured largely in this picture. The film was very short, showing nothing more beside the elephants than sacred cattle being hitched to light vehicles and, later on, engaged in a race, something on the order of a chariot race in the circus.

At any rate, it was a charming little picture and it sent us away happy in spite of the doleful doings that went before. Too bad there are not more of them. But one thing we can say in favor of Pathe is that they give us more good educational and scenic reels than any other film manufacturing concern in the business, and, if they are willing to take our word for it, there is nothing they turn out that is any more interesting than these.

Crystal Theater, Louisville, Ky.

A couple of months ago one of the handsomest as well as one of the smallest and most compact motion picture theaters in the South was thrown open to the pubic at 314 West Market Street, in Louisville, Ky. The new house, known as the Crystal, offers some interesting features to the picture world in general, for it is an excellent example of the results that can be accomplished in a narrow space, of great length, toward constructing a playhouse which will fulfill every requirement of the municipal authorities in regard to safety of the public and which will show up, in spite of its tube-like shape, as a very beautiful specimen of the theater architect's art.

The Crystal Theater is located in a very busy section of the shopping district of the city where space is very valuable, and is very well laid out considering the limited space. The house though narrow in appearance from its front elevation is extremely long and capacious. The ventilation is scientifically correct. The picture projected is 12 by 18 feet, with a 75-foot throw. The screen sets high in the rear and the floor is well sloped, giving a full view of the picture from any seat in the house. The exits are large, and open upon a public alley. Seating capacity 400. Opera chairs, made of oak, satin finished in green, to conform with the interior color scheme of rich red and emerald green. At all times the house is thoroughly lighted.

The operating booth is constructed of metal and measures 8 by 12 by 9 feet in dimensions, affording plenty of room for two machines and two operators at the same time. The two machines are both Powers No. 6. Every article in the operating room is made of metal. The Crystal is equipped with a system of hot water heating for winter heat, and for ventilation there are two exhaust fans four feet in diameter, placed on either side of the screen at the rear of the building. These provide a cool current of air during the summer. A twelve-hour show from 10:30 to 10:30 is run daily, in all fourteen performances, consuming a little less than an hour's time and consisting of three reels of first-run Independent films.

A four-piece orchestra furnishes the music and sound effects are a feature. While the admission is only five cents, the Crystal offers as complete a program as any ten cent theater. The house is under the management of Mr. C. F. Hansomp.

A Perceptible Improvement.

By Jane Elliott Snow.

It requires no unusual wisdom on the part of lovers of the photoplay to see that there is a great change for the better in the character of the plays, generally.

When the photoplays were first introduced, and for some time thereafter, there were far too many scenes showing a reckless destruction of property.

It was not uncommon for an apparently choice piano to be thrown from a wagon, and reduced to fragments; or an entire cupboard of dishes would topple over, and its contents go down in a general wreck. Indeed, it often occurred that the greater the destruction of property the greater the merriment on the part of the audience.

The effect of these scenes upon communities could not help but be harmful. For the small boy, as a rule, is prone to be a "smasher" of all his playthings, and of things in general, and he needs no exciting influences, such as these pictures produced to add to his natural propensity in that direction.

Where there used to be many such scenes introduced into photoplays there are now but few, possibly none.

Another bad feature of those early photoplays was the practise of making a hero of a criminal. Or, if he was not made a hero, his method of doing a criminal act was well shown forth.

There is no question but that too frequent repetition of these kinds of plays did much to throw the whole business into disrepute. Not that they were worse—that could hardly be possible—than scenes frequently enacted upon the stage of leading theaters, but their very cheapness gave them so much larger audiences that their evil influence was more noticeable.

Children are wonderfully imitative beings. Let a circus, or a Wild West show pass through any community and for weeks thereafter groups of small boys will be seen running, jumping, or performing various acrobatic "stunts," while Johnny's hobby horse has to gallop to Banbury Cross at a much greater rate of speed than the ordinary.

I well remember, when a child, of attending a "sleight-of-hand" performance where the leading performer took a potato, sliced it on a plate, and passing the plate through the audience asked the men to add to the dish a liberal supply of snuff and tobacco, which they did.

In a moment, quicker than the eye could detect, the slices of potato with their vile seasoning were changed into delicious cookies, that were in turn passed around and freely partaken of by many present.

This, with other similar "tricks" so excited my childish imagination that for weeks my little companions were entertained with mimic shows of a very extraordinary kind.

Speaking of this "perceptible improvement" in the photoplays is a reminder that there is still room for more improvement, and here is hoping that some time they will get the cowboys dressed up in their Sunday best—that is, if they have any such garments.

For really and truly if the hero of the plays must be continually brought to our notice why not have him, at least part of the time, arrayed in something besides old clothes? For while his life may be strenuous, and very much neglected, he must at times wear new clothes.

Now civilization demands that people be respectably clad and while the photoplays are admittedly an educational force, a very decided praise should accord those every thoughtful heart that such plays be presented as well teach our boys to have some regard for personal appearance in dress as well as otherwise.

Johnny's mamma has a serious time keeping her little son up to the standard of her "set" in the matter of dress. She is very much mortified to see him with holes in the knees of his trousers, and with a decidedly "baggy" appearance about the hips.

But Johnny delights in this style because the cowboys in the moving pictures are usually clad in that way.

In conclusion, let me say that whatever improvement there has been, or will be made in photoplays the Moving Picture World has been and will continue to be a mighty factor in the work because its record shows that it stands for all that is best in that form of amusement.

Mrs. Ruth Dickey, of the National Board of Censorship of moving pictures, is a firm believer that animated pictures will be the educator of history and geography in public schools in the near future. Mrs. Dickey believes the children can obtain a better vision and understanding by witnessing pictures than they can possibly by reading books.

A Word To The Exhibitor.

By John M. Bradlet.

There is one drawback to an open market, the fact that too many persons go into the moving picture game with a ready desire to make money quick at the least expense. They have no taste whatever and anything is good enough for them as long as it is cheap. This will not be a very serious drawback, because if some exhibitors cannot tell a bad picture from a good one and believe that anything is good enough for the public, they will soon awake to the truth, that if they have no taste, the public at least is educated.

The exhibitor, in general, is a person who has to find fault with everything and is the very last one to lend his services to correct the abuses. Be he licensed or independent, the exhibitor has to place the blame on either the Motion Picture Patents Company or on the Sales Company. He does not blame his own poor management for his failure to make his investment a paying one. No, in his opinion it is the fault on the time, of the exchanges, in fact of any one connected with the business, except himself. He does not see the reforms that he should introduce in his theater, but he sees where the manufacturers and renters could improve.

The exhibitor talks much, rages more and is free with good advice, but do not ask him to attend meetings, to try to get together with his colleagues, to do a little work for the good cause, etc. He will grumble, but he will not act.

I cannot say that all the exhibitors' meetings have been successful. They have been disappointments for the leaders. These meetings lack freedom, lack confidence; the few present are there with the idea that if a proposition is made by Jones, it is that Jones is a selfish man, looking out for himself. Petty jealousy reigns supreme in all these meetings and this demon of jealousy works so hard that the best propositions offered fall flat.

Here we are at the eve of a national convention and nothing is ready. The exhibitors clamor for the convention, they want an open market, they want to see their business improve. Yet no one is doing active work for the convention. The exhibitors of Chicago wait to see what the exhibitors of New York will do, the ones from New York wait to see what Philadelphia will do, etc.; they are all too distraut to take a hand; they all wish the convention; they all expect that their neighbors will do the fighting for them and no one is moving. By this time, every town should have its local, every State should have its organization and the locals and State organizations should be working to prepare for the national convention.

Is it not time for the exhibitor to realize his position and take steps for his own safety? On one hand he is governed by the manufacturers, who had enough common sense to unite themselves into two very powerful organizations, the Motion Picture Patents Company and the Sales Company. On the other hand, he is at the mercy of the operators, who had also the good common sense to unite themselves.

The exhibitors are not united and if one suffers, the others do not come to his help.

An exhibitor with an investment of $50,000 can be ruined at the will of the manufacturers or of the operators. The manufacturers' organizations can refuse him service. The operator can declare a strike on said exhibitor. Now if this exhibitor with $50,000 invested in a theater was a member of a said organization, the said organization could help him. In case of an unfair strike, the whole organization could influence the operators. If in trouble with the renters or manufacturers, the members of the organizations could help him.

Many exhibitors also ruin themselves by trying to ruin their own competitors, by trying to run their show at a too low expense, or do not know how to spend money in a judicious way to obtain the best results. Everything must be cheap, the quality does not count, yet these exhibitors clamor for an open market on the ground that better pictures will increase their business. Same story with the slides. They refuse to pay 50 cents for artistic slides because they can buy common slides as low as 20 cents. One theater, with a rather big name, in an excellent location, will not pay 50 cents for a good slide, but shows to its patrons what the manager calls an intermission slide. The slide represents six men in bed with their feet sticking from under the bed covers. On the soles of the twelve feet are printed the letters to form the word "Intermission." A slide of very poor taste, badly colored and not good enough for the public.

The failure of many exhibitors is not due to what they claim the fault of the manufacturers, of the renters, etc., but to their own lack of taste and lack of business ability.

CHEAP HELP.

Cheap help is the most expensive luxury that a moving picture manager can afford. We know that many young men are only too willing to be Free Ushers. It is tempting for the manager to have well-dressed young men, dudes, willing to work night after night for nothing or practically for no wages; so much money saved to swell the bank roll. Those young men are what we can term mashers. They want to be ushers to have a chance to flirt with the girls visiting the show. If the manager saves $1.50 per night by employing a free usher, he will find that he is losing twice the amount in patronage, as respectable young girls, ladies and children will not patronize a theater where they are liable to be insulted by the young mashers. Other managers who had some bad experience with the free ushers are not yet converted to the idea that you have to pay good wages if you want good help and they engage men, worthy of the prefix "tramp." Men with no manners, dirty, rough, repulsive, and too often the offensive odor from their dirty clothes is enough to drive many persons away.

CHEAP ADVERTISING.

Antique or cheap, common advertising is worse than none and is money thrown away. Our public is too well educated to-day to be deceived with a lot of cheap, ugly, sensational posters. On the first day, these posters can boom the business a little, but on the following days the persons fooled once are not going to bite a second time and no matter how excellent may be the show, they will pass the house with this word on their lips: "Humbug." To get them a second time you must add more and more sensational posters until the whole lobby and front of the theater are entirely covered with ugly, sensational posters, leaving no room for more extra display.

When a manager advertises, he must prove that this advertising is not a fake, otherwise he is a lost man.

The following experience will be a good illustration:

The other day, while the sun was hot, I passed in front of a moving picture theater. The pictures advertised on the boards were very tempting and a great display of signs were still more tempting. One sign named the number of fans used to cool the inside of the house. Another sign gave the amount of ice used to cool the atmosphere and a third, still larger sign, depicting white bears frolicking on giant icebergs. Such a display of signs was enough to give you a chill on the hottest day of the season. As we walked to the box office the poor girl cashier was so busy fanning herself and drowning her sorrows in a glass of lemonade that she did not see us and at the same time a puff of hot air came from the ticket box, telling us that the inside was like an oven. Our eye caught sight of another miserable mortal—the doorman. Poor fellow. He had a hard fight to mop the perspiration running down his face, his collar had no more shape, he appeared very uncomfortable in his heavy winter uniform and gave us the impression that the advertised fans, ice, etc., did not cool the place.

As we were going to retreat we saw a man emerge from the theater. He was another victim of the heat. He was in shirtsleeves, sleeves rolled to his elbows, no collar, but the shirt opened at the neck, mopping his face and with a cigar stump in his mouth, he looked as miserable as both the cashier girl and the doorman. He was the manager, as his heavy watch chain and the sparkling diamond in his shirt front denoted that he was not a common individual. He stopped a moment to look at his attendants, then walked across the street to enter a saloon to get a little more steam into himself.

At the return of the manager we approached him and found him to be a general kicker. Yes, business was bad, the pictures were rotten, the service still worse, the parks were taking the trade away, even his neighbor up the street was giving an extra show to capture the public. To hear him talk, every one was to blame except himself, while in my opinion he was the only one to blame.

Less liquor in his system would be less steam and with less perspiration he could keep himself more decent in appearance and not give the impression that his place is as hot as the quarters of his satanic majesty. At a small expense he could have the window glass of the box office removed and replaced by some grille or screen work, he could provide a neat little awning to protect the cashier from the reflection of the sun rays on the sidewalk. At another small expense he could provide a neat and white summer uniform for his doorman and turn his sad, painful expression into a pleasing and inviting smile. These improvements would cost less than the numerous painted signs and would be more effective, as they would tell the truth.

My attorney took me to the competitor, accused of giving extra inducements. We found nothing of the kind, no extra show, no flourishing signs, no bluff, but we found white uniformed attendants with a genial smile and their cool and comfortable appearance invited us to enter the place.

Appearance is the keynote to success. The American public is educated, wants the best, will pay for the best and patronize the places putting in some appearance. The trouble in motion pictures is that we had too many push-cart men to invest their savings in moving picture theaters. They are not educated, they are not even cleanly, they only care for the nickels. They do not see how they can increase their receipts by spending some judicious money.

We are thankful that this class of cheap exhibitors is fast disappearing and that the business is falling in the hands of experienced show men. It is for the present exhibitor to look forward for improvements and not run his show on the old lines "that anything is good enough for the public." It is not.

Much has been said for and against the open market. Will we get the open market? If we do not get the open market? I do not think so, but I will say that, afraid that we have attained what we were fighting for—namely, better pictures. Are the manufacturers afraid of an open market? We do not think so, but we will say that, afraid or not, the manufacturers have taken the hint and they have not only improved the quality of the work, but I understand that the best studios are working on productions that will rank as real masterpieces. The agitation has worked some good effects, so let us hope that the exhibitors will recognize these facts, unite themselves and keep up the fight for good work, to go on forever.

Cape Cod.—Two picture theaters have been recently opened on Cape Cod, one in Liberty Hall, Sagamore, Mass., and the other in Town Hall, Sandwich, Mass., by W. A. Winsor, proprietor of Winsor's Garage. The theaters are unique in that Mr. Winsor has built his own power plants from the ground up. Direct current is used, with Powers equipment and licensed film service.

Boston

The New England Vaudeville Managers' Protective Association, the organizing of which has been noted in these columns, has now incorporated, and a brief resumé of its by-laws follows, showing wherein the moving picture theaters are interested. The object of this organization is "to promote reforms in the conduct and management of vaudeville and moving picture houses; to promote the general welfare of the members of this association and of their business; to resist, and protect them and their business, against unwarranted attacks. . . . To encourage a high standard of morality on the vaudeville and moving picture stage, and in the conduct of vaudeville and moving picture theaters throughout New England." The initiation fee has been made $50 for houses seating 500 or over, and $15 for houses seating less than that amount. Monthly dues are $3, payable in advance. Anyone running vaudeville in New England in connection with any theater may become a member. The moving picture interests are largely represented in this association, both as members and on the list of officers. This fact shows the dignity cinematography has attained in the last few years. Had the Association been formed a few years back, it is certain that the moving picture men would not have been so politely requested to become members of the executive committee, etc.

The Gaiety Theater, Washington Street, after two weeks of "pop" vaudeville and pictures, decided not to continue, and closed June 3. In the Gaiety we find a new, high-class regular theater, with an excellent location on Boston's busiest street. Pictures and vaudeville were offered, with a uniform admission rate of ten cents. The house tried the experiment last summer, but gave up after six weeks' trial. As things were no better this year, Mr. George Batcheller decided that two weeks were enough. Both Patents Company and Sales Company were represented this year, as one week's service of each brand was tried.

The Globe Theater, another "legitimate" house, just opposite the Gaiety, is doing well with a show of just the same proportions as that of the Gaiety.

The W. E. Greene Film Exchange, 228 Tremont Street, has notified the trade that they will give a free demonstration of the Nestor "Mutt and Jeff" talking pictures at the Joliette Theater, Bowdoin Square, Tuesday, May 6. At this writing, interest is rife over these pictures, and the Nestor advertisement in The World of June 10th was read with much interest by exhibitors, following, as it did, the message from the W. E. Greene Film Exchange on the matter. More than one Licensed exhibitor remarked that he was "going to take a look, anyway."

The Casino Theater, Hanover Street, devoted to burlesque, has given up the idea of a supplementary season of "pop" vaudeville and pictures, and closed June 3.

Manager Appleby, of the Star Theater, jumped on the midnight express to New York on June 3. The coronation pictures, as promised by the new Kinemacolor Company of America, have roused Mr. Appleby's interest, according to his statement. It is only just to state that this manager carried with him a list of places to go, made up from the advertisements in The World of June 3. HENRY.

EXHIBITORS.

First State Convention Under the Auspices of the Detroit Moving Picture Exhibitors' Association.

Detroit, Mich., June 9, 1911.

Editor of the Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—At a regular meeting of the Detroit Moving Picture Exhibitors' Association, held on June 5, 1911, it was decided to call a convention on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, July 11, 12, 13, 1911. The dates were definitely set, upon receipts of many letters from exhibitors through the State of Michigan expressing their willingness to be on hand for the occasion. All indications point to a great gathering and a successful meeting is looked forward to.

The purpose of the State organization is for the future welfare of the moving picture exhibitors of the State of Michigan.

All manufacturers who have appliances that are essential to the moving picture exhibitors are kindly asked to correspond with our secretary, who will see that space is set aside for their exhibit.

Trusting you will give this notice space in your valuable paper, we remain, Respectfully yours,

The Detroit Moving Picture Exhibitors' Association,

"TWINS" (Rex).

"Twin" stories are always interesting, no matter how improbable. They have been written by the greatest writers of all periods, since long before Shakespeare down to Mark Twain, who leaves his comedy of Pudd'n-head Wilson on twins and thumb-prints. Who, therefore, can rise up in their two-sheeted rage and accuse Ed Porter, producer of the Rex Company, of "stealing their stuff" when he produces a story entitled "Twins"?

Twins afford equally good matter for either drama or comedy. In the present case the Rex Company has worked out a very original story of the lives of two twin girls, which assumes a dramatic tendency towards the end. It is far from being commonplace, because it is free from the usual entanglements of most twin stories. The reason for that, in this case, is because the twins are played by the same woman, Miss Lois Weber, and they never meet. In other words, it is a dual rôle, played by the gifted leading lady of the Rex Company with her usual full power.

The play is very clear and self-explanatory, which is a remarkable thing when one is obliged to keep track of twins. The story deals with a pair of twins who were adopted from an orphans' home by different parties at different times. One found its way into a home of wealth and luxury; the other went to a widow's home to take the place of her own daughter that had passed away. Although looking very much alike as they grow older, the dispositions of the two girls are not so much alike. As sometimes happens, the more fortunate one has developed a peevish and treacherous disposition, while the other has become a very lovable character amid a life of toil and want.

The way matters lead up to the meeting of all parties in a climax is pleasing, because of the fact that it is logical, original and convincing. There is a point in dramas of this kind where it is very, very easy for the playwright or producer to spoil the whole business by some slight unnatural or improbable action or incident. In this picture of "Twins" Mr. Porter has skilfully steered clear of the rocks of conventionality and anticipation. The photography and scenic arrangements are, of course, up to the usual Rex standard, which is the very best. The producer has chosen with rare artistic sense a number of beautiful outdoor backgrounds that appeal so much to the eye that they cause the beholder to yearn for green fields and blue skies. Very few people will believe upon seeing this film that the outdoor scenes were taken during a heavy downpour of rain at the very unusual hour of 7 p. m.

The characters are all well cast. Miss Weber in her dual rôle is of course as charming as any one could wish. Mr. Philip Smalley is always a reliable lead and acquitted himself as the foster brother in his usual finished style. Joe Engel as the cruel boss is immense, and has Simon Legree beaten to a frazzle. Miss Hohlfeld as the stenographer of the shirt-waist factory was the first moving picture stenographer we have seen that looked like the real thing. In the language of 13th street, "she done fine."

As a general summary of "Twins," the exhibitor may look forward to a reel that will please his patrons. It is not the strongest thing the Rex Company has ever done, and perhaps they do not pretend that it is, but nevertheless it is good, wholesome, interesting and dramatic all the way through. It has not only an original plot, but the ending is one of the prettiest that we have ever seen. We recommend it to our exhibitor friend who wrote us a few weeks ago about "too much gum-sucking" in the pictures. There is, of course, a happy ending to "Twins," but it does not end in a "clinch." The ending is one of the neatest little bits of suggestive work that we ever saw and we are sure that every exhibitor will breathe a sigh of relief and whisper "Amen" when he sees it.

PERSONAL PATTER.

Doc Willet, general manager of the "Imp" Company, was caught on Twenty-third Street one morning this week trying out a new Hupmobile automobile, which he purchased a few days previous, and to demonstrate his ability to control the machine and at the same time obey the traffic regulations, he invited us to have a ride with him, and, strange to say, we are very glad to mention the fact that "Doc" showed his appreciation for us several times during the five or six blocks we rode with him, by allowing us the privilege of cranking up four times. But never mind, "Doc," they all stall their engines while they are learning.

Bill Swanson.—Among the recent arrivals to the city that have exhibited themselves on Fourteenth Street is the ever-smiling Bill Swanson. Bill has accumulated quite a roll, and as he has no bad habits to separate him from his coin, he figures the railroad should get some of it, and that is his reason for his frequent trips to New York.

"MOLLY PITCHER"—Champion.

Few stories in the history of the War of Independence, so rich in incidents of heroism, appeal more strongly to patriotic and general sentiment as that of Molly Pitcher. One of the licensed film makers about two years ago made the story the chief subject of a patriotic film. It may be noted right here that the production of the Champion Company, while by no means absolutely flawless, is a decided improvement on the previous production. Dramatically the story has been well sketched and the film has made full use of the many fine touches, in which the tradition abounds. The general tone of the production is commendable; there is no ill-advised rushing after sensational effects and even the most fastidious board of censorship could find no fault with the film on the score of moral cleanliness. No possible fault can be found with the photography, which is excellent throughout. A word of earnest praise is likewise due to the acting; the artist, who essays the leading rôle possesses emotional and dramatic powers of no mean degree and is well adapted for the part, for which she has been cast. As the success of this photoplay largely depends upon the skill and talent of the actress, who takes the part of the American heroine, it goes without saying that the Champion has in this film given the public an acceptable historical picture. Greater care should have been taken with the staging of the play, for in pictures, which are intended to portray historic scenes, proper settings are of course essential. On the whole, however; the Champion Company has undoubtedly taken a step in the right direction, has chosen its subject well and has worked it out to the best of its ability. The shortcomings above mentioned, can of course and no doubt will be easily remedied and there is every prospect that with time and experience this company, if it intends to film other historic events or traditions, will acquire all the necessary skill, of which this present production gives no small promise.

"DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE."

Thanhouser Produces a Patriotic Reel for July 4th.

The film deals not only with the Declaration of Independence, but with the Boston Tea Party, Paul Revere's Ride, the Redcoats' Retreat from Lexington, and in addition to all this gives the life of John Hancock, the first signer of the Declaration and the first American millionaire, telling his famous love story and inspiring patriotism in others by showing how true a patriot he was Hancock who, with most of his wealth lying in Boston holdings, said: "Burn Boston and make John Hancock a beggar, if the public good requires it." The reel, which the maker is advertising as "a subject that interests more Americans than any other ever made" is released on Tuesday, July 4th.

A businesslike lobby adornment will be found in the display of plenty of American flags, four muskets (preferably old), two drums (preferably old), the famous Trumbull picture of the Signing of the Declaration (can be hired from any picture store), and facsimile copies of the Declaration (can be hired from any picture store). A good arrangement of these would be:

Flags—Drape front to best effect.
Drums—One on each side of lobby, crossed by two muskets.
Muskets—Two crossed above each drum.
"Signing" Picture—Hang or fasten to one side of lobby.
"Declaration" Facsimiles—Hang or fasten to side lobby opposite "Signing" picture.

If you have board for circulars or photos, drape with flag and tack on literature pertaining to the reel. Posters can be put up in the usual place. A release of so patriotic a nature as this affords the exhibitors a chance to advertise his show as one that should not be missed.

ECLAIR TECHNICIANS ARRIVE.

Among those who have left Europe to become identified with the moving picture industry in America there arrived recently to complete the technical and mechanical forces of the new American Eclair Company several important departmental heads, prominent among whom are Charles Collett and Gaston Larry, both of whom have been associated with the firm of Eclair for a long time and are highly regarded as men of unusual technical ability. The new Eclair plant is nearing completion and will soon be ready to market productions. Applications are pouring in from acting people, directors and others who are anxious to become identified with the new company.

These are being filed as received and will be taken up in a definite way and selection made for the regular stock companies shortly before the completion of the studios and works. Thirty odd cases of machinery reached here from Paris on a recent steamer and will be installed in the new plant during the coming week.

"FAUST."

A Notable Two-Reel Release by Pathe Freres.

This is the third film production of the Faust story. The Selig Company over a year ago put out a very free adaptation of "Faust," and Edison came some months later with a more ambitious attempt, which followed the opera rather than the drama. Pathe's production, which is the subject of the present review follows in the main the opera, takes one or two incidents from the drama and frequently departs from both opera and drama in independent variations of its own. The Pathe version has two great advantages over its predecessors—it deals with the subject in two reels and is colored. This latter feature in so spectacular a play as "Faust" must not be underestimated. Besides, much of the music has been made to fit with the proper scenes. To bring out the full power and beauty, however, a lecture is needed, especially as here and there the sequence of events needs some explaining. In the lecture prepared for the Moving Picture World the words of the drama, wherever they fit the action of the film have been closely followed, and it is hoped that this will be found to make the story doubly attractive. The idea to show on the screen the metamorphosis from fiend to dog and back to fiend was a piece of daring, which even a severe critic must admit has been cleverly done, but how many, who have only seen the opera and never read Goethe's story will understand and appreciate it? It may be mentioned in passing that a black dog, such as described in the drama, would have heightened the effects of the magic transformations. Another bold stroke of the film maker was the introduction of the phantom horses, on which, conjured out of the blackness of the night by Mephisto the latter and Faust gain access to the tower, where Marguerite is imprisoned. In the duel scene we should have preferred to see Mephisto in his own proper shape, the incident is altogether too tragic to allow of the successful introduction of experimental tricks. Realizing the tremendous difficulties of the film maker in such an undertaking, it would be unreasonable to criticize changes, that were evidently made in order to hasten the action and bring it within film limits. The main scenes are without one single exception brought out with singular force and felicity, the kirmess scene was charming and the dancing superbly graceful, the duel scene has nothing in the film, the meetings in the garden are done with an exquisite beauty, the prison scene is as affecting as in the drama and the prayer of Marguerite before the shrine of the Virgin is in a bewilderingly beautiful setting of Pathe's own design. The film, I have no doubt whatever, will enjoy great popularity and ought to be a boon ever very intelligent exhibitor, who will advertise and present it properly.

ESSANAY—THREE A WEEK.

Essanay Will Issue Third Reel On Friday.

Beginning the week of June 26th, the Essanay Company will issue three reels every week. The release date for the third reel will be Friday, and the first one to be issued will be "An Old Man's Folly," a drama, for Friday, June 30th.

Among the number of coming releases by the Essanay Company, a few of the most important are the following: "The Baseball Star from Bingville," a baseball comedy after the style of the Essanay's big hit of last year; "Take Me Out To The Ball Game." This comedy is a full-reel subject, and with an original plot and unusually funny comedy situations. Other Western dramas and comedies now ready for release are "The Corporation and the Girl." "The Backwoodsman's Suspicion," "Mustang Pete's Love Affair," and others. This last named is a comedy of unusual laughing qualities. Two short comedies by the Essanay Eastern Company will be released July 4th—"Swat the Fly," one of these latter is a seasonable little comic after the old style Essanay "slapstick" comedy. The idea is clever and the comedy situations are good. "Getting Some Eats," a short comedy on the same reel will also be found to satisfy the fun-loving theater-goers. The Essanay third reel will be welcomed by exhibitors who want comedies of the style which has gained much popularity for the Essanay Company.

WESTWARD, HO! THE VITAGRAPH PLAYERS ARE THERE.

Beginning Wednesday, June 28th, and every Wednesday thereafter, the Vitagraph Company will release a Western life portrayal, involving the intense heart interest of love home and country and the wholesome thrill of realism in deeds of adventure, heroism and daring, but avoiding the impossible yellow cover, dime novel type, of the melodramatic blood and thunder variety.

THE MACCABEES—(Pathe).

The tale of the Maccabees, abounding in heroic action and lofty sentiment, justly attracted the film maker with its magnificent possibilities. It is a pleasure to record the fact, that the manufacturer has done complete justice to so difficult a subject and has given the exhibitor a most valuable production. It will be remembered, that at a time, when the national and religious spirit of the Jewish race seemed to be at its lowest ebb and everything seemed to point to their absorption by the culture of the Greeks, these heroic men, known as the Maccabees, fanned the ancient Jewish pride and patriotism into new life and commenced a brave, though unequal struggle against the Syrian hosts. The film maker has given an historically accurate picture and in this splendid setting tells a story of gripping dramatic power. The favorite of the victorious king Antiochus, interested in the captured and imprisoned Jews, sees Judas Maccabaeus and hears him address his people. The stern, heroic mould of the young warrior's character rouses in the queen's heart a passionate desire to know him and to be loved by him. It is by no means an ignoble love, in fact, the young son of Israel seems to have awakened all the finer womanly emotions in Astarte's heart. He, firmly bound to his creed creed and his people, does not understand her advances and spurns them. Yielding to the momentary impulse of revenge Astarte brings about the destruction of Judas and his family, but it results in her own excruciating remorse. Having set the machinery of death in motion, she finds it out of her power to stop it and save the man, whom now she loves with a pure and unselfish affection and she seeks death with him. This part of the story is shown with overpowering effect and makes an uncommonly strong climax. The acting throughout is splendid and unstinted praise must be given to the scenic arrangements, the costuming and all those minor details, which contribute so much to a perfect production. The Moving Picture World has prepared suggestions and a special complete lecture for this film, which, it is hoped, will be a welcome aid to the intelligent exhibitor who understands the importance of putting on such feature films in a telling and befitting manner.

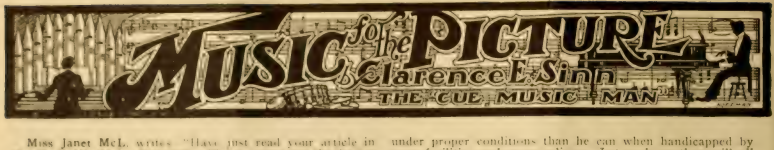
THE AMERICAN WESTERN COMPANY.

Much of the success attained by the American Company, in their "Flying A" Cowboy releases, can be attributed to the interest taken in the organization of the Western Company by Mr. S. S. Hutchinson, the president of the American Film Manufacturing Company. Mr. Hutchinson is a Westerner. He was born in Cheyenne, Wyo., in the early Sixties. Cheyenne at that time was a frontier cowboy town and the center of the cattle industry in the United States. The Western Indians were, for the most part, as yet unfettered, and it was a comparatively uncommon occurrence for him to see the entire garrison manning Fort Laremie, which was located close to Cheyenne, called out to subdue some savage squad of blood-thirsty redmen, who were running amuck in close vicinity to his birthplace. The knowledge gained by Mr. Hutchinson of Western life generally, of the habits eccentricities, and peculiarities of the cowboy, during his early years, was used by him to the great advantage of the company, upon it's organization in the West. Through his relatives, some of whom are still residing on the fringe of civilization, were located the best riders, the best ropers, and the best all around cowboys that the West can boast of. Their capable horsemanship, picturesque appearance and general worth is well attested and evidenced by the superior quality of the "Flying A" product as it is being released to-day.

David Horsley exhibited the Mutt and Jeff pictures at the Boston Theater in Chicago Wednesday of last week to a crowded house of exhibitors and exchange men.

Mutt and Jeff certainly have become national characters and the pets and delights of the newspaper reading public. There is no question that their reproduction as moving pictures will meet with joy in the hearts of many numerous admirers. A decided novelty is the last title "talking the picture." In connection with the Mutt and Jeff picture were shown two reels of Western film stories, introducing among others a fighting parson in a six-round battle—one of the best fights anyone would care to see, and which no doubt will make a big hit among our friends of the sporting fraternity.

The "talking" effect in the Nestor pictures is in the line and requires no special machine.



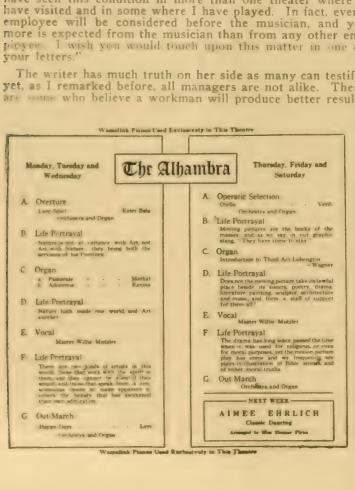
Miss Janet McL. writes "Have just read your article in the M. P. World for May 27th. Please accept my thanks for your timely article, not alone from the point of the spectator, but from the point of the player. I have always contended that the 'cue-music' should be played for moving pictures just as for any drama or comedy. I have tried to explain this to managers of M. P. houses, but they always insisted on the popular music of the day, irrespective of its fitness for the picture." (I have been hammering at this for nearly six months.—C. E. S.) "I think they are influenced solely by a desire to create a noise, thinking it will draw a crowd." (The street-fair showman with his "bally-hoo" hand still exists in the moving picture business, but is not so prominent as he was a few years ago; maybe he is changing his views or is being crowded aside.)

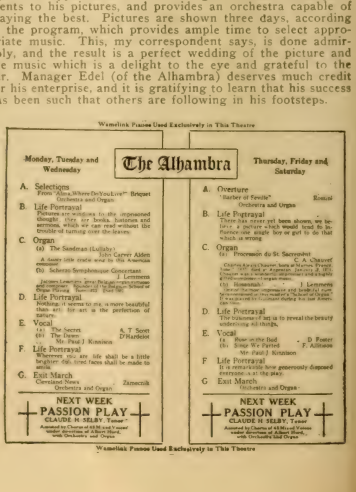
"Moving picture spectators are beginning to discriminate between 'noisy,' rough places and 'quiet,' respectable places. If the management provides 'noisy' entertainment you can expect the audience to be noisy, and vice versa. In New York City last summer, I gave up going to the picture theaters more on account of the poor quality of the music than on account of the pictures. Some of the vaudeville was so vulgar I could not remain. . . . Now may I speak of the M. P. Theater from the musician's standpoint? Why do moving picture managers think that anything is good enough for the musician? The manager will ask the musician for the best he can give and in return he will supply a cheap, poor piano, half the time old, out of tune, and so dirty a sensitive musician cringes at touching it." (I am happy to state from my own knowledge that all managers are not that way; the management of the Orpheum Theater, Chicago, for example, is considerate to the last degree of all its employees, including musicians; but our correspondent has good grounds for complaint, as all know.) "In addition to the poor piano, the player is furnished with a hard wooden stool, on which he may sit, four, five or six hours with no support to the back, and a measly little light that covers one page of music. I have seen this condition in more than one theater where I have visited and in some where I have played. In fact, every employee will be considered before the musician, and yet more is expected from the musician than from any other employee. I wish you would touch upon this matter in one of your letters."

The writer has much truth on her side as many can testify, yet, as I remarked before, all managers are not alike. There are some who believe a workman will produce better results under proper conditions than he can when handicapped by poor facilities and surroundings. Let us hope they will all be of that mind in the near future. Then it will be up to the musician; and this species, be it known, is as variegated as is the genus manager. We have all kinds of people with us. I have not space to give the letter in full, but will make one more quotation: "I am playing here in one of the M. P. theaters and have had many compliments for my 'cue-music.' I try to express the 'action of the mind' as much as possible. This cannot always be done, because the producer often gives us action foreign to the motive of the scene and story."

For the benefit of late comers to our page, I will state that 'cue-music' is a term employed by theatrical musicians generally to indicate 'dramatic music.' I am in receipt of a letter enclosing programs from the Alhambra Theater, Cleveland, Ohio, reprints of which appear herewith. The writer, who is an observant traveller, says, in part: "The comment on the musical situation is far from overdrawn. On a recent visit to Toronto, where no music at all is given until 3 p. m., and very little after that time, I wondered if it were possible to do any greater injustice musically to the photo-play. My stay in this city (Cleveland) has proven to my satisfaction that it is. The Alhambra here, however, programs of which are enclosed, is, in my opinion, the greatest step forward yet made in this country in the exhibition of motion pictures. It deserves an extended notice in the M. P. World. Admission is 10 cents to 50 cents, capacity 1100, music superb—far ahead of the Orpheum in Chicago in my opinion. Orchestra consists of pipe-organ, piano, violin, 'cello and drums, and the success is such that another similar theater to seat 2,000 persons has been begun at 55th and Broadway, with well-founded rumors of several more to follow. Pictures are the features, with music and an occasional high grade act."

The programs below certainly show that a high grade of music is given, and the Cleveland public are to be congratulated upon having in their midst a moving picture manager who appreciates the value of good musical accompaniments to his pictures, and provides an orchestra capable of playing the best. Pictures are shown three days, according to the program, which provides ample time to select appropriate music. This, my correspondent says, is done admirably, and the result is a perfect wedding of the picture and the music which is a delight to the eye and grateful to the ear. Manager Edel (of the Alhambra) deserves much credit for his enterprise, and it is gratifying to learn that his success has been such that others are following in his footsteps.





Notice—Securing positions for operators and others of whose ability and reliability the editor has no personal knowledge, is found to be impracticable. It is, however, the desire of the Moving Picture World, as well as the desire of the Editor of this Department, to give every possible, reasonable aid to men out of a position. It has therefore been determined to offer operators, managers, film photographers, musicians, and in fact, any one connected with the business, the opportunity to set forth their needs in an "AT LIBERTY" column, at the rate of one (1) cent per word per week. Each initial and number counts as a word. This nominal rate is open only to those out of work.

Questions on Last Week's Lesson.

(1) What is taught us by Physical Optics?
(2) What does science teach us about light?
(3) Is a light "ray" physically possible? If not, why not?
(4) Of what use is the ray as applied to the study of light?
(5) Recite the laws of reflection.
(6) What is meant by the Angle of Incidence?
(7) What is meant by the Angle of Reflection?
(8) What is a "Normal?"
(9) How prove the angle of incidence equal to the angle of reflection?
(10) If a mirror be turned so as to alter the position of the normal on the scale, does the angle of reflection and the angle of incidence alter equally?

Under certain conditions it happens that pencils of rays coming from one point appear, by reason of reflection or refraction, t oemanate from another, or a second point. When this occurs this second point is called an image. To make this more clear: We see a candle in a mirror. There is no candle there, of course. What appears is an image of the candle. Images are, however, divided into two classes, viz: Real and Virtual. Understanding the real meaning of these two terms from definitions and matter contained in text books is about as easy as understanding the method of solving an algebraic problem by reading a novel.

The most lucid definition obtainable, so far as the writer could find after consulting every work on light he could discover, was "Images: It may often happen that a pencil of rays diverging from a point is caused by reflection or refraction to, or do appear to, diverge from a second point. In either case the second point is called an image of the first point. Images may be real or virtual. Definitions. (1) When a pencil of rays diverging from a point is made, by reflection or refraction, to converge to a second point, that second point is called a Real Image of the first point. (2) When a pencil of rays diverging from a point is made, by reflection or refraction, to appear to diverge from a second point, that second point is called a Virtual Image of the first point."

There, now, you understand all about it, don't you? The book (Light, by Glazebrook), then continues "In the case of the real image of a point the rays which form it actually pass through it; in the case of a virtual image the rays which form it would, if produced backwards, pass through it, but do not actually do so."

There! Surely you thoroughly understand the matter now! No? Well (whisper) neither did I, even after I had read a dozen equally complicated "definitions" and descriptions of the difference between a real and a virtual image. Yet the matter is really quite simple. It is the surplus verbiage which confuses one.

A real image is one which is actually where it appears to be, or , in other words, where it is formed by the focusing of the rays. A Virtual Image is one that is not really where it appears to be. It might be further added that a real image is one existent in the air and which becomes visible when a screen is interposed to receive it.

That is what all that rigmarole of words really stands for and actually means. To illustrate by example: When we project a moving or stereo picture, the image seen on the screen is a real image because it really is where it apparently is. Is is at the point where the rays converge to a focus and form the image. When we look at ourselves in a plain, flat mirror, the image is a virtual image for the reason that, while it appears to be exactly as far back of the mirror as we are in front of its surface, as a matter of fact it is not and cannot possibly really be there. This rule applied to any image made by light rays will hold good, and by its application you may determine whether any image is real or virtual. I have gone to much trouble to prepare a simple, understandable definition of the Real and the Virtual Image, since each will be from time to time referred to as we progress.

Considering the Virtual Image for a moment we find certain very interesting experiments may be made, for instance, thus: Cover a flat table with a large sheet of white paper, upon which set mirror A, B, Fig 17, having no frame, its edge coming directly into contact with the paper.

Now at some point, say C, stick into the paper an upright pin. Next, placing the eye level with the paper at some convenient point, say D, look at the image of the pin in the glass, setting two pins, E, F, upright exactly in line with the eye and the image. Now move the eye to some other point, say G, and again in exact line with the eye and the image, fix upright pins H, I. Next we remove the mirror and with a perfectly straight ruler draw closed lines I, K, and J, M, using pins E, F, as a guide for lines J, K, and pins H, I, as a guide for I, M, until they intersect behind the position occupied by the mirror, at L. Now if we draw line O, P, normal to mirror, A, B, in such position that it meets pin C, it will also exactly meet the intersection of lines J, K, and I, M, moreover it will be found that pin C and the intersection of lines J, K, and I, M, will be exactly the same distance from the reflecting surface. We thus again learn that the angle of incidence is equal to the angle of reflection. That light travels in straight lines, and that an object is exactly as far to the front of the reflecting surface as the virtual image appears to be back of it, also exactly as far to one side as twice the distance from the eye to a normal drawn from the reflecting surface, which intersects the line of vision at the mirror as we look at the image, provided, however, the eye be the same distance from the mirror as is the reflected object. This latter is perhaps not stated very clearly, but I believe you will catch the idea when considered in connection with Fig. 17.

It might be well at this point to call attention to different kinds of reflection. If we darken a room, allowing but one beam of light to enter through a hole in the blind, and allow that beam to fall upon the surface of a silvered mirror, we shall see a blinding glare when the reflected ray meets the eye. Unless the mirror be in such position that the angle of incidence and reflection between the body, the mirror and our eye be equal, the ray will not meet our eye and we shall hardly be able to see the light spot in the mirror at all. Substitute a piece of polished metal, such as tin, for the mirror and the same is true, except that we shall see the light spot fairly well even though the rays do not directly meet the eye. Again substitute a sheet of white paper and there is no longer a glaring reflection when the angle of incidence and reflection between the paper, the eye and the hole be equal, but the spot is plainly discernible from any portion of the room or at any angle the paper may be held. The light is still reflected, but it is at the same time scattered (diffused) in every direction instead of in straight lines at a certain angle. The angle of incidence remains, but the angle of reflection has been obliterated. In plain reflection we encounter what is termed "lateral inversion." As we stand in front of a plain mirror, our right hand appears as though it were the left, while the left becomes the right. This, in brief, is what is meant by "lateral inversion." It is by lateral inversion we are enabled to read lines on a blotting pad. Tips after setting may be readily read by means of a mirror.

Davenport Operators.—Mr. R. A. Brock, Davenport, Ia., writes: "I have been reading The World for the past year and think it the best paper there is. In this town we have fourteen five cent theaters, six of which employ union operators. All the union boys here belong to Local Union No. 85 I. A. T. S. E., as we haven't yet enough members to form a local of our own. Nevertheless, we hope to secure a sufficient number in the near future. Enclosed find two photographs, one of the six union operators and the other a photo of my operating room. The room is 6x6 ft.; rather small, but I can get along all right.

The equipment is a Powers No. 6 with Edison lamp and lamp house. The current is A. C. 60 cycle, 110 volt. My throw is 95 feet; picture, 8 x 10. We use a Fort Wayne compensarc on a 30 ampere contact, one 7½ and one 6¾ condenser and get a first-class picture. The names of the operators from left to right are: 1, Earl Cornish; 2, George Vroo-man; 3, Walter Herin; 4, Bert Freemmer; 5, Arthur M. Warner, and 6, A. B. Brock."

We are glad to meet the union operators of Davenport face to face and thus make their quasi-personal acquaintance. The operating room picture is certainly unique and the best stunt of the kind I have yet seen. I would, of course, not presume to tell the Davenport boys what to do, or even advise them concerning the conduct of their affairs, except to say that a small organization is usually an expensive thing to maintain, therefore, unless there is good and sufficient reason for separating from the I. A. T. S. E. local it might perhaps be better to remain amalgamated with that body. There is no more discouraging thing on the face of the earth to maintain than a very small organization. This for a good many reasons. Iowa is my native state and I know your city quite well. The operating room picture is excellent.

Addresses Wanted.—Rochester, N. Y., writes: "I would like to have the addresses of film exchanges in Canada. I am very desirous of locating somewhere in that country. If you can furnish me the addresses desired it will be a great favor."

I have not at hand a list of the Canadian film exchanges. I would suggest to Rochester that he might better get in touch with the various unions in Canada, if he desires to secure a position as operator in one of the cities, though the film exchanges might be able in obtaining situations in smaller towns. The photograph on the correspondent's letterhead shows a bright young man, and the legend of the letterhead reads: "Expert Moving Picture Operator, Theatrical Electrician and Lantern Slide Photographer." I would be glad to furnish the address of the brother to any Canadian exhibitor desiring same. I would suggest that it would be to our mutual advantage if the various unions send in the addresses of their secretaries in order that it may be kept on file. We will publish a column of union secretaries each week if desired. Very frequently I have matters which should properly be referred to some union, but I am unable to do so through lack of addresses of the union officials.

Measuring Condensers.—Brooklyn, N. Y., writes: "Kindly give me, through your valuable Department, the correct rule for figuring out the proper back focus on both front and rear condenser.

Pin a sheet of white paper to a wall removed as far as possible from a window, or, in the absence of a window, not less than 10 feet from an incandescent light globe. First, hold the flat side towards the paper, focusing the picture of the window or globe sharply on the paper, and measure from paper to the flat side of the condenser. Next, reverse the lens, placing the convex side towards the paper and, after focusing sharply, measure to the flat side again. Add the two results together and divide by 2; the result will be the focal length of the lens.

Those owning handbooks will please cut this out and tip it in with paste between pages 172 and 173, it being a better method measuring than is there given.

Several Questions.—Lancaster, Pa., writes: "On one line I have a piano, three lights and three fans: 220 volt D. C. (1) How many amperes should I use? (2) Should the fuse plugs of the line and the fuses on the piano be of the same amperage? (3) What will the result be if I use a 10 ampere and a 20 ampere plug together? The piano would be plenty. (4) When using 20 amperes on any line, am I using twice the current I would be when using 10 amperes? (5) Kindly advise me in the simplest way how to set the fan on a Powers No. 5 machine. (6) What is best to use on a curtain when wishing to give it a new coat?

(1) Your question is altogether too indefinite. You do not state the h. p. of the piano motor, the size of the fans nor the c. p. of the lights. Therefore, this question cannot be answered, except to say that three 16 c. p. 220 volt lights would consume less than one ampere of current, and your fan motors, unless quite large ones, would hardly consume to exceed one ampere each. Making a rough guess, I should say the whole thing would consume approximately 5 amperes of current; but, of course, this is merely a guess, not knowing, as I said, the exact size of the motors or fans. (2) No; the line fuses must be large enough to carry the whole load of three fans, one piano motor and three lights, whereas the individual circuit fuses on the motors should only be large enough to carry the current of each individual motor, and the light circuit should have only a fuse large enough to carry three lights. To fuse one motor with fuses heavy enough to carry current for four motors and three lights would offer practically no protection to the motor at all. (3) The practical result would be that your 20 ampere fuse would be of no use and you would be protected only by the ten ampere fuse on one side. Such an arrangement would be bad from any and every point of view and should not be permitted to exist. You could only use the 10 ampere plug on a line carrying that amount of current or less. If you attempted to use above the capacity of the 10 ampere fuse it would blow regardless of the fact that its mate was of 20 ampere capacity. Therefore, in effect, the other side of the line would be fused to double the current which could be carried, and would offer no protection at all. (4) This is answered in 1 and 2. As I have said, assuming your fans to be small ones, that is, ordinary 16 inch wall fans, 5 amperes ought to be enough. Twenty amperes at 220 volts is precisely twice the amount of electrical energy that ten amperes at the same voltage would be. The watts, which represent electrical energy, are found by multiplying the volts by the amperes, and the horsepower is found by dividing the watts by 746. Twenty amperes at 220 volts is $20 \times 220 = 4400$ watts; 10 amperes at 220 volts is $220 \times 10 = 2200$ watts. Dividing 4400 by 746 will give you the horsepower in one case, and dividing 220 by 746 will give you the h. p in the other case.

(5) I would advise you to send in $1.50 for the Motion Picture Handbook, in which, on pages 111 to 114 you will find general instructions for setting of all shutters (you say "fan," but I presume you mean shutter), while on the pages following you will find instructions for setting the shutters on the various machines, by means which we have this book. (6) I would have to know what kind of a curtain it is. In the Handbook you will find, on page 142, directions for mixing curtain paint, and in the back numbers of the Trouble Department you will find directions for at least a dozen different kinds of curtain coating recommended by the different operators and exhibitors who have written in.

Machine Trouble.—Oklahoma (name of town suppressed by request) writes: "I have two type B 1910 Model Edison machines with a throw of 75 feet. I have had trouble with both machines as follows: On one of them I cannot keep my picture in focus; at one moment it is sharply defined all over and at the next you can see a blur on the screen. The lenses are tight in the holder. The other machine shows a good picture, but the picture is out square on one side, and now and then you can see the sprocket holes on the same side. I have set my intermittent sprocket over, but that doesn't seem to help the picture at all."

On one of your machines, it is quite evident that the film is buckling in and out as it passes the aperture. This may be due to a number of causes, however, to see to it that the two screws which hold the casting on to which the aperture plate is attached are tight. In other words, see that the casting is held rigidly and solidly to the frame. These two screws are back in the mechanism. The fault of buckling is very frequently due to tension springs either being loose and moving from side to side, or else unevenly set

The Edison Manufacturing Company, Orange, N. J., can furnish you with the outside shutter attachment for your machine, and it would probably be best that you purchase same from them. On page 1248 December 10, 1910, issue is shown a photograph of the Edison Exhibitor model machine to which a three-wing shutter was attached by Mr. L. D. Van Loenen, Bakersfield, Cal. The method of attachment is shown quite plainly. Also in other back numbers of the Department instructions have been given for the attachment of a three-wing outside shutter to the Edison machine. I would suggest that the Department readers who have performed this particular test communicate with Mr. P. O. Box 398, Nelson, B. C., Canada, giving them the desired information also sending same to the Department for publication.

Theater and School.—Mr. Willis E. Reynolds, "The Moving Picture Man," Philadelphia, Pa., writes: "Reading your Department in the June 3rd number of The World, I observed your comment under title of 'A New Stunt,' and the conjecture as to the effect upon the motion picture business, should the movement become general. I would suggest that local managers could devote Friday night (there being no lessons to study) or a Saturday matinee to the presentation of some good picture selected by the principal, admitting the children with 'merit tickets' free. The publicity gained for the local house in this way will compensate for the loss in free admissions. While entertainments given in school halls would not interfere with the business in the larger cities, it might prove to be 'opposition' to the local man in a small city. The wise manager anticipates such conditions and instead of antagonizing them, should fall into line, with the view of promoting the popularity of his house. Is there is a class of people in his town who are knocking on account of the 'blood and thunder' pictures, frame up a better show for a week and go after the 'king and queen of the knockers.' Invite him personally in an interview, and, if they accept, get their opinion of your show. Nine times out of ten it is better than they expected and they say so. Now get an absolutely true story of that interview and that opinion in your local papers, in the news columns. It won't matter much to the local man what it costs. Now, go after the educational institution with the free proposition, quoting the paper, and land it."

The editor of this Department heartily endorses Neighbor Reynold's remarks. The plan, in my judgment, is worthy of serious study by up-to-date managers both in cities and smaller towns. The moving picture theater in this way could, we believe, add to its own popularity and, at the same time be a distinct aid to the cause of education. In last week's issue of The World there appeared an editorial entitled "The Exhibitor as a Teacher," which should be read and acted upon by all moving picture men who wish to be in the van of progress.

Film Jumps.—Iowa (name of town suppressed by request) writes: "I am having a great deal of trouble with my films jumping. I have read the Handbook and followed instructions as closely as possible, but the film still jumps. I am using late stuff, some not more than two weeks old; therefore, it cannot be the fault of the films. I clean the sprockets and tracks every day. Both are in fair condition. Do you think it could be due to sprockets or track?"

You should be more definite in your description, Iowa. The mere statement that your film jumps might mean any one of several things. In the first place, you do not even say what kind of a machine you are using. However, see to it that your tension springs are set tight enough. See to it that there is no lost motion in your intermittent sprocket. I would suggest that you try a Pathe film which is in good condition on your machine, and if it jumps then the fault is in the machine. Certain makes of film jump very badly and for that reason I suggest a test be made with a Pathe. You must, however, send me more definite information before I can give you intelligent advice. One other thing, however: keep the face of your intermittent sprocket scrupulously clean. Gum and dirt collecting on the face of the sprocket is a prolific cause of jumping. I will also add that if there is a rhythmical, regular jump four times to every turn of the crank, it is pretty sure evidence your intermittent sprocket or its shaft is not true.

From Afar.—Mr. W. K. Cuzner, manager and owner of the Crown Theater, Sydney Mines, Cape Breton, writes: "Editor Trouble Department: Wisdom cometh out of the East," so the proverb runs, but, for all that, we of this extreme eastern point of the continent do not yet consider ourselves so wise that we are unable to appropriate and profit by the ideas and experiences of others not so favorably situated longitudinally. While I have no particular trouble to worry you with, my conscience—some moving picture theater men have a conscience—will not permit me to be constantly steering clear of trouble without making some acknowledgment of the medium by which I am enabled to do so. I certainly set great store by the 'Moving Picture World' and the 'Trouble Department' alone has been worth more to me than the price many times over. I avoid troubles of my own by familiarizing myself with the troubles of others and noting the remedies you suggest. As a rule, I have found my perplexities anticipated and the remedies provided, even before the necessity for the application had arisen. Therefore, I hold that the time spent in studying the various departments of The World will return better value than the same length of time devoted to any other branch of the picture producing business, and I am taking considerable space to say so, for the reason that I am also speaking for many other of your patrons who, did each speak his own little piece, would swamp your columns with appreciative effusions. Enclosed please find clipping from the North Sydney Herald, which will give you an idea of what is going on in this section of the world."

We certainly appreciate your kind words, Neighbor Cuzner, and are more than pleased to note that the "Moving Picture World" and its various departments have been of value to you in that far off corner of the earth. The clipping sent by Friend Cuzner sets forth the fact that he has perfected arrangements for the erection and equipment of a new theater of large capacity and up-to-date appointments. The clipping also says: "The initial outfit will comprise Powers No 6 machines, and the mechanical and electrical installation will comprise all the latest wrinkles for securing faultless projection. There will be a complete elimination of all rainstorm features that the resultant screen effect may be a "thing of beauty and a joy forever." Mr. Cuzner is highly spoken of by the paper, both as a citizen and as a theatrical manager. We wish him every possible success in his new venture.

Operating Room Photo.—Mr. Gordon Le Feure, Toronto, Ontario, Can., writes: "Enclosed herewith find photo of our operating room, from which you will see that I am running two Powers No. 5 machines. Toronto will soon be a regular moving picture town, as we are going to have a Board of Censorship, and operators will be obliged to take an examination and be licensed. Yours for perfection in projection."

There are two things I particularly like about your letter, Neighbor Le Feure; one is that you speak of the operating room and underscore the word "room." The other is that you signed your letter, "Yours for perfection in projection." I have repeatedly called attention of operators to the advisability of elimination of the word "coop," or "box" and similar terms, substituting therefor the words "operating room." So long as we talk about coops, boxes, etc., we are very likely to have them. Perfection in projection is what every operator should bend every effort to attain, and the principal work of this Department is designed to bring about, if not perfection, at least improvement in projection. It has pleased us more than anything else to receive many letters from managers saying that through the study of the Department by themselves and their operators projection in their houses has been materially benefitted.

Condenser Mount.—Kansas (name of town suppressed by request) writes: "I received the Handbook some time ago and have not yet had time to sing my praises of it and the good it is doing operators and managers. I have a mania for the Trouble Department, and as I have not yet contributed anything to it, I hand you herewith a drawing of my condenser holders, requesting that you express your opinion of the same.

The holder consists of four pieces of clock spring which run horizontally from the edge of one condenser to the other, just as either end receive the condenser, as shown. A similar band of metal with a spring encircles the lower horizontal guides. The holder is 3/16 of an inch smaller in diameter than the condensers, the advantage being that it reduces breakage by allowing plenty of room for expansion, eliminates the extra trouble and holds the condensers perfectly square with each other. I use one 6-in. and one 7½ condenser, have a Powers No. 6 on the wall 19 ft. and two 25 ampere Edison shootsaks hooked in multiple. Have 28 feet throw and 18 feet picture and use an Allen's adjustable lens. I get a good picture, but have my troubles the same as anyone else, and I try to master them. I have been in the business for nine years both on the road and stationary, and have yet to find an operator who knows it all. You will find quite a number who think they do. Ed.] My worst difficulty is as follows: We are pulling from a direct connected D. C. generator; it registers 115 volts at all times and from 7 p. m. to 9 p. m. it is difficult to get a clear white light, though after that it is fine. I am out in the yards from the plant with a drop of 2/0. We use No. 6 wire. If you can explain this to me I would be very thankful."

The condenser mount is simple and excellent, though you have failed to explain in what way it is mounted in front of the arc. The Powers No. 6 condenser mount is square, and I would like to have you explain just how you hold the lenses in position in the condenser boxing. The electrical problem you put up is something of a puzzle. From 7 to 9 p. m. is not the time of the heaviest load at this season of the year. The heavy load ought not to come on until nearly 8 o'clock, and there should, therefore, not be a very heavy load on the dynamo until that time. Moreover, if the dynamo holds its voltage constantly at 115, it is indisputable evidence that it is supplying the necessary current at the power house. The only thing that I could suggest is that the lines between the generator and your house are at that time in the evening too small to carry the load, which causes the drop in voltage by the time the current reaches your house, even though the distance be but 150 yards. This hardly seems probable, but it is the only thing I can suggest. You should get a volt-meter and test your lines on the line side of the rheostats during the hours when your light is poor. I think you will find there is a considerable drop in voltage as compared to the generator pressure.

Position Wanted Column.—Lima, Ohio, writes: "I note your refusal to secure positions for operators. I thought you were doing an unwise thing in trying to place men of whose ability you had no personal knowledge. I would respectfully suggest that you have a column of space devoted to operators who are at liberty. It would not take up much space to insert a man's name and address and he would then stand on his own feet and not on yours. When he gets a position he should notify you, so that his name might be withdrawn. I make no profession of being a real operator. To my mind, an operator is a master of projection, and that, I am afraid, I can never hope to be. I will, however, pass along a few stunts I have found to help a whole lot. An operator should always keep on hand a few good reels, since he will frequently find that the reel received from the exchanges is in bad condition and wabbles. By painting the sides of the loose reels (those reels he keeps for himself) black or some other convenient color, there will be no danger of them being sent away by mistake. I do this myself, and it has saved me a lot of bother and worry. I have a way of threading the top and bottom magazines and can get my film through the fire traps while the average man is getting ready to do it. Should I send it to some machine maker? I and several others think it is very good. It may be of interest to operators to know that carbons, in burning, generate carbonic gas, and the arc flows through this gas and not through air, as many suppose. As proof of this, let any operator light his lamps, draw the carbons about ¼ inch apart and blow directly at the arc. If he blows hard enough he will force away all the carbonic gas and the light will go out. Any operator who is good at writing signs can obtain from a photographer old undeveloped plates. I get them 8 x 10 for 10 cents a dozen. Cut them to slide size and you can then write in the emulsion with a sharp pointed instrument anything you may desire. The beauty of this is the silver compound will not allow any light through. It is a yellowish color and the work can be outlined with a pencil. Here is something I think is fine: on the baseboard of any machine set a flat piece of iron between the stereo and moving picture gate, so that when you shove the lamp house to the stereo your light must pass this strip (sitting up-right). Get your light exactly where you want it in your stereo; pull over the light strip and mark top and bottom of the light spot; do the same with the moving picture gate. Now when you start a show set your light on the strip, adjust it to your stereo marks and when you push over to the stereo lens you know absolutely that your light is O. K. After the song pull over to the spot marks on the strip and adjust the light just right for moving picture stand and you will have a clear field when you start the moving picture. Not long ago I noticed in throwing the election returns they wrote the returns on the slide as it was being projected. You could see the point of the pencil on the screen as they wrote. How was that stunt pulled off?"

The various things you have described, Lima, will no doubt be of interest and benefit to the readers of the Department. Therefore, accept our thanks for same. As to the writing of the election returns in the way you mentioned, it is done by means of a reflectoscope. It is a specially constructed machine with an arc lamp in a box table. The light strikes at a 45 degree mirror inside the box and reflects up through a condenser set in the upper surface of the box. Above the condenser is a lens upright on a bracket, and above the lens is another mirror which is adjustable and reflects on the screen. The writing is done on a slide that lays flat over the condenser. The lamp handles project through a hole. If you care to send the film threading notice to me I will examine same and offer my advice as to what you had better do with it. As to the "At Liberty Column," We have arranged to instrt advertisements of operators, managers, musicians—in fact, anyone connected with the business—at one (1) cent per word per week, the only condition being that to take advantage of that nominal rate they be actually out of work; see elsewhere.

Machine Trouble.—Miami, Okla., writes: "I just received the 'Moving Picture World' and studied the light lesson. I am following them very closely. I am having a little trouble myself right now. There is a ghost in the center of my picture. It is oblong, about 6 feet in length. I use one 6½ condenser and one 7½ condenser. My throw is 59 feet; 45 amperes, 110 volt 60 cycle current, through a Powers inductor; 8/8 Electra carbons. My picture jumps up and down. I have a Powers No. 5. There is no lost motion whatever between the star and cam. The tension springs seem to rest squarely on the aperture plate tracks and the intermittent sprocket is almost new. I have one of your Handbooks and have tried all the things you suggest, but with no effect."

I cannot tell whether your condensers are of the proper focal length or not, inasmuch as you did not tell me the width of your picture. If your moving picture lens is more than 4 inches E. F., I would try two 7½ condensers. Be sure that your condensers set square with each other and that your whole machine is in line from the front end of the projection lens to the arc. Try pulling your lamp house back as far as it will go. Try a different set of carbons. As to the jumping, it is very likely that either the intermittent sprocket shaft has been in some way sprung a little so that it is no longer true, or that the sprocket is out of true. If the picture jumps regularly four times to each turn of the crank, then either the shaft or the sprocket is not true. Be sure that you keep the face of your intermitent sprocket perfectly clean and free from all gum and dirt. Use a tooth brush for this purpose. Test the machine with a good Pathe film—one in good condition, I mean.

Cutting Out Resistance.—New York City writes: "Allow me to ask the same question you answered last week, but which I did not quite understand. If I want to get more current out of a Miles Bros. rheostat, can I cut some of the wires out and take out one or two grid plates? Will that increase the current, and is it a hard job to do? Can I hook on a Miles Bros. rheostat with a Powers Standard in multiple and get it to work? Your answer was 'Not in New York,' but it doesn't explain anything. Rubber covered stranded wire has seven strands, and you measure one, etc., to get the strand, but how do you measure asbestos stranded wire? You surely couldn't measure one at a time, for they are too fine. What do you do?"

What I meant by my answer last week was that the cutting out of resistance in a rheostat, or the use of rheostats in multiple is absolutely prohibited in New York City by the Department of Water Supply, Gas & Electricity. Don't do anything of that kind in New York City unless you have a desire to lose your license. I do not remember ever having examined one of the Miles Bros. rheostats. I cannot, therefore, offer you intelligent instructions as to how to remove grids. You speak of removing some of the wire, and some of the grids. Am I to understand from this that the rheostat is composed of both wire coils and metal grids? You can remove one or two grids from any rheostat and thus reduce the resistance and consequently increase the flow of current. However, it is very likely that the remaining grids would then heat unduly and you would very much shorten the life of the rheostat. Yes, you measure the diameter of one strand of the asbestos wire with a micrometer calliper, count the number of strands and proceed as previously instructed. You can measure the thickness of a human hair accurately with a micrometer calliper. These instruments are comparatively costly and the better way is to take one of the strands to any machinist and have him measure its diameter for you, which he will no doubt do without charge. That is the only way a stranded wire can be accurately measured. You can also find the gauge of one of these strands with a B. & S. wire gauge, but the micrometer is the thing to measure with for the purpose named. You can use any two rheostats in multiple, provided they are both built for the voltage you are using. A Powers and Miles Brothers, or any other make will work together in multiple the same as though they were all the same make; also a 15 ampere will work with a 25 ampere, a 45 with an 18, etc. The only condition is that they both be built for the pressure used.

A New Law.—The following law has been passed by the legislature at Albany, and has received the Governor's signature:

AN ACT

To amend the general City Law, in relation to license to operate moving picture apparatus. Section 1. Article Two of chapter twenty-six of the Laws of Nineteen Hundred and Nine, entitled "An act in relation to cities, constituting chapter twenty-one of the consolidated laws," is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof a new section, to be Section Eighteen, and to read as follows: It shall not be lawful for any person or persons to operate any moving picture apparatus and its connections in a city of the first class unless such person or persons so operating is duly licensed as hereinafter provided. Any person desiring to act as such operator shall make application for a license so to act to the mayor, or licensing authority designated by the mayor, unless the charter of said city so designated, which officer shall furnish to each applicant blank forms of application which the applicant shall fill out. Such officer shall make and promulgate rules governing the examination of applicants and the issue of licenses and certificates. A license shall not be granted to an applicant unless he shall have served as an apprentice under a licensed operator for a period of not less than six months prior to the date of the application; the application must be made in writing and contain a certified statement to that effect, and it must be accompanied by the affidavit of the licensed operator to the same effect, before entering upon the period of apprenticeship the applicant must register his name and address with the officer issuing said license. The applicant shall be given a practical examination under the direction of the officer required to issue such license and if found competent as to his ability to operate moving picture apparatus and its connections shall receive within six days after such examination a license as herein provided. Such license may be revoked or suspended at any time by the officer issuing the same. Every license shall continue in force for one year from the date of issue unless sooner revoked or suspended. Every license, unless revoked or suspended, as herein provided, may at the end of one year from the date of issue thereof be renewed by the officer issuing it in his discretion upon application and with or without further examination as he may direct. Every application for renewal of license must be within the thirty days previous to the expiration of such license. With every license granted there shall be issued to every person entitled thereto a certificate stating that the person named therein is duly authorized to operate moving picture apparatus and its connections. Such certificate shall be displayed in a conspicuous place in the room where the person to whom it is issued operates moving picture apparatus and its connections. No person will be eligible to procure a license unless he shall be of full age. Any person offending against the provisions of this section as well as any person who employs or permits a person not licensed as herein provided to operate moving picture apparatus and its connections, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding the sum of one hundred dollars or imprisonment for a period not exceeding three months or both.

Section 2. This act shall take effect immediately but shall not affect or apply to existing licenses, nor to the holders of existing licenses.

The Editor of this Department is of the opinion that the new law contains one serious defect, viz. it contains no provision prohibiting apprentices from running the projecting machine except under the direct, personal supervision of a licensed operator. Many owners and managers hold licenses as operators and, unless the new law is bolstered up by a strict rule of the Department of Water Supply, Gas & Electricity, absolutely forbidding licensed operators to allow apprentices to run the machine except under their direct, personal supervision, I apprehend that many cheap "apprentices" will have ample practice at the crank. I am told that plans to test the validity of the new law are already under way.

Later. Mr Lang informs me he has not received assistance from Mayor Gaynor that he will sign the bill.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

BALANCING THE PROGRAM.

Jackson, Mich., June 5th, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir: If there is a manager in all the realm of picturedom who is not well acquainted with the phrases, "Order from your exchange at once," "Ask for film 10089," and many more similar ads, he certainly does not take the World and needs looking after. Attest this I notice with interest Henry's "Balancing the Program."

I suspect we managers need considerable prodding now and then, but it seems rather out of place to come at us in this fashion. I have heard of some Michigan managers running three reels, but have never yet run across one who was foolish enough to run four reels unless it be some occasional one when they make no effort at running a steady show.

But the main point is a well balanced program. It is all well enough to talk of, but the manager has about one-tenth as much to do with this as the higher ups and these same higher ups care just about as much about how the programs balance as they do whether we get comedy at all. I think a safe estimate would be that nine out of ten managers run but two reels. The smaller city manager knows quite well the value of time, especially on Saturday and Sunday, when he must make his profits, if ever. Now he runs but two reels, one of them dramatic, the other a split reel (a very rare occurrence). Now, how are we to manage this to get it between the dramas? Shall we run one comedy, then have a wait while we change reels? This would evidently be a loss of time.

I am with this matter as with many others upon which much is being written. It is utterly useless for any manufacturer to ask exhibitors to request reels of the exchange. They might just as well expect to get one of the special reels at a reasonable price. I know whereof I speak because of personal experience. The exhibitor has not the slightest chance of choosing his subjects and in most cases the programs are so manipulated that all the managers, operators, writers and editors in the business could not balance them. How can a manager balance a program of two Indian pictures, two dramas, two comics, two fire scenes—all of which I have had in programs lately?

Let me tell you that you will find plenty of talent in balancing programs as well as conducting shows generally when we once have a chance to exercise this ability. Unbalanced programs are not to be laid at the door of the manager, but to the idiotic policy of the higher ups trying to conduct the business without consulting the interest of either public or manager. When the manufacturers learn that they must make a proper amount of comedy to perfectly balance the dramatic issues and then insist into exchange heads the fact that they are not the whole "it" they will have done more for the uplift of the business than a whole book on balancing programs under existing conditions.

The manager is, so to speak, bound hand and foot. He can make no choice of subjects, cannot know three hours ahead what he is to run, cannot advertise the picture in advance. In fact he is about as near a nonentity as imbecile policies can make him. My suggestions to writers in general is to strike at the root of the evil and this as well as other lines. Show the people who are throttling the business the error of their ways. Make it possible for the manager to select a picture of his own choice now and then. Give him a chance to know what he is to get a few hours ahead so that he can advertise if he wants. Give him the fighting chance of a man, then if he fails to balance his programs it will be high time to criticise and not until then.

CINEMATOGRAPH FILMS FOR SALE.

American Consulate, Turin, Italy, May 27, 1911.

This consulate has been asked to inform American dealers in cinematograph films that an American buyer is sought for an altogether unique series of films showing members of the Italian royal family, including the royal children, and taken in various parts of Italy. The films are to be sold outright and are to become the exclusive property of the purchaser, so far as America is concerned. The proceeds of the sale are to be used for charitable purposes.

Replies to this inquiry should be addressed to the American Consulate, Turin, Italy.

Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—I would like to have a space in your paper to answer two queries. First, F. M. S. wants to know when the manufacturers will stop making sensational pictures. The answer is, not as long as the exhibitor will use them without kicking, and if that will not do any good refuse to take those makes from his exchange the same as I have done with three Independent makes until they produce films that are right.

Second, the films that would stand a two-day run are so scarce that an exhibitor would be unable to bill it right. The best way is to repeat all good films as soon as possible.

Yours truly,

CHAS. REARK,
Mgr. Theatorium.

"PRO BONO" RAPS THE EXHIBITORS.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—After spending an unpleasant forty minutes in the subway, I plunked down my little dime at the ticket window of "Crystal Hall"—yep! I went all the way down from the Bronx, expecting to see some select reels of Independent films (because the Independents don't seem to be very well represented up this way). My expectations were shattered, however, for I was treated to a Bison that I had seen twice at that very same house, and next came a three-year-old Pathe, and then I made my exit. I am exceedingly sorry that there is not one decent Independent straight-picture house on Fourteenth Street. There are some Independent manufacturers doing admirable work, and it is an injustice to them that the result of their labor and expense is not presented to the public of New York City.

Yours respectfully,

"PRO BONO PUBLICO."

SAILOR-OPERATOR DEFENDS THE UNIFORM.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—Recently an article appeared in your magazine concerning the discrimination against the United States sailors and soldiers in uniform, by the Portsmouth, N. H., theater owners. The action taken by those exhibitors, shows gross disrespect against the flag. I have had service in the United States Navy for four years, and the United States Army for three years and have been up against the same proposition myself, only in a dance hall. Take the exhibitors of Portsmouth and put the proposition of wearing a uniform of Uncle Sam up to them and how many would do it?

No words can ever describe the suffering and privations the soldiers and sailors have stood in past wars for their government, only to be insulted and degraded by such men, who are running theaters in Portsmouth. Any one who will wear the uniform representing the United States Government ought to be entitled to all the respect that can be shown him.

I have read the World for the last two years and have gained a lot of information from it. Hoping to see this in print, I am, your ardent admirer,

"THE DEARTH OF COMEDY."

Portsmouth, Va., June 5th, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—I read your article in The World of June 10, entitled "The Dearth of Comedy," with a great deal of interest. As an exhibitor I say to your good sense and logical whole truth, Amen.

I am using twelve reels weekly, but I get from the exchange eighteen reels per week for the sole purpose of the fifty per cent. increased chance of getting a comedy with the show. My patrons demand Comedy.

The manufacturer that you interviewed was so far from being right in his assumption, and it is hard to believe he ever studied the total best interests of the business. I have spent twelve years in the amusement business, and have traveled the country pretty thoroughly and my experience has taught me that every time you find one person who will remember a tragedy or sad fact or fiction, you will find hundreds who will remember every detail of something that caused them to laugh. They try to forget the former and retain the latter; that's horse sense and human nature and a fact.

I believe the trouble is that they can't get good comedies, and put up the more solemn pictures in preference to paying the price required for the quality. I would rather have dramas all the time than the kind of comedies (?) that make the actors in the pictures nearly have convulsions with laughter, but leave the audience to whom they are shown looking like they have lost something and are wondering where it is. It is not funny to see the actors laugh unless the cause of their mirth is the first ranks to demand of my exchange the product of any manufacturer producing such goods.

Pardon the length of my opinion, I hope the greatest success will crown your efforts in behalf of the entire moving picture industry and its dependents.

Yours very truly,

C. A. TURNER.

VENTILATION.

Editor Moving Picture World, New York,

Dear Sir: Seeing an article in one of your issues some weeks ago about ventilation for the M. P. theater, will describe my place, as it might help some exhibitor out in hot weather. I have a house 25 x 100 feet, 14-foot ceiling. I have a 36-inch power fan with 12-inch galvanized pipe leading into rear of auditorium. This fan is driven at a speed of 1500 revolutions per minute by a 5 H. P. motor. This supplies my house with fresh air and keeps the temperature down nearly as low as it is outside. Then I use four ceiling fans to keep the air circulated. I have used this method two years and have never had any complaint from heat in the house in the hottest of weather. My motor cost $75. My power fan is of the type used at planing mills for transferring shavings from the machines to the boiler-room, and is also used at cotton gineries for transferring cotton. It cost me second-hand $45. It will keep the house pleasant without the ceiling fans, and I have had patrons tell me they came in to get a cool breeze as much as to see the pictures. Hoping you will find space for this information, I am,

Respectfully,

H. J. MORRIS

"Dave's Love Affair" (Biograph).—The feature of this comedy is the sudden appearance of Dave. His friends play a joke on him by sending him a note about a certain Clarice and then make May so jealous she sends him away. Repenting of their misdeeds they explain matters and everything is pleasant once again. It's a slight picture.

"Their Fates Sealed" (Biograph).—This is an original comedy. Two young men enter a fishing contest, the understanding being that the one who has the largest fish by a certain hour shall have the hand of the girl both want. The hour almost arrives and the one she wants has the smallest fish. At the psychological moment, a large seal suddenly jumps out of the water and seizes the unsuccessful man's fish and so he's the winner, for the seal has sealed his fate. There is very little to it one can hardly call it funny, and the pleasant ending is the only thing worth commending.

"The Professor's Ward" (Lubin).—This comedy has a very amusing situation, which was played theatrically at the expense of the characters and also, one feels, at the expense of a good deal of fun. There is not much difference between the irascible aunt of the story and the objecting parents of many other films, though the part gave an excellent chance for sympathetic acting. It might have contributed much more to the fun than it did. There is a pinch of "The Hoyden" in Miss Lawrence's interpretation of the professor's ward, but it isn't nearly so fine. She seemed occasionally trying to heighten the effect with funny attitudes, such as turned in toes. Yet her playing was more consistent than was Mr. Johnson's professor, who now and then seemed to fall out of his character altogether. The picture, just as it is, is good, so good that one wishes it had been treated as it deserved. The backgrounds are all very pretty, especially the garden, which is a beauty.

"Khmara" (Pathe).—This is an interesting film and seems to be a scholarly picture of Russian life during the dominance of the Tartar khans. The peasant's rough hut is contrasted with the barbaric splendor in the tent of the roving prince. The peasants seem to be pure Russian; the prince and his followers at least partly Tartar. The Oriental bowing down before the prince is worthy of mark too in people who before the khans came were so fiercely independent that they could hearly rule themselves. It's a commendable picture.

"Miss Blum" (Pathe).—This picture shows Miss Blum doing trick riding on her bicycle. It is a stage picture. Her balancing powers are marvelous.

"The Wages and the Wage-Earners" (Edison).—This very interesting picture tells a romantic story of a wealthy young man and an heiress, both of whom for different reasons undertake to earn their own living. They meet and fall in love, each thinking the other poor. The acting makes it a very commendable picture. The backgrounds are interesting and carefully chosen. There are no weak places apparaent in the picture.

"Love of Summer Morn" (Kalem).—This film pictures the love story of an American lieutenant and his squaw-wife, Summer Morn. She wasn't acceptable to the ladies of the army post and to save her husband the constant annoyance and shame of being ignored because of her, she goes back to her people. The Indian girl and the lieutenant meet again under romantic circumstances not far from a beautiful sacred pool in the hills. The Indian girl sacrifices herself by committing suicide in the beautiful pool when she sees that the lieutenant, whom her father told that she was dead, has married again.

"Sacrifice" (Vitagraph).—This is a life portrayal and it is poignantly acted, especially in the scenes after the childless mother accepts the white carnation, the mother's-day flower. This woman adopts the prisoner's child. There is human beauty in the scene in the prison when the woman with the child visits it to distribute flowers. The prisoner doesn't know that he is talking with his own child; because of that scene and all it implies, we understand and are thoroughly convinced by his attitude toward the child after his release and by his sacrifice. The woman who loved the adopted child knows what that sacrifice meant. The story is told with a keen an delicate sense of values that makes it clear and convincing. It is acted with much emotional power, especially by the convict and by the woman. The child of the story filled her part charmingly.

"A Broken Life" (Pathe).—This is a tragic story of the West. There is deep irony shown in the denouement. The lover of the story—he isn't shown until that moment as especially heroic—leaves the villain in the happiness of a wife and child and home and money and good name and departs a broken man. The woman was to have been his wife, and the money was his money. The villain had robbed him in the desert and left him to die. For the woman's sake he departs after warning the villain not to ill-treat her.

"The Love Story of a Great Actress" (Gaumont).—This is a very excellent picture and a deeply stirring one. It's a tragedy with a victorious ending. The scenes are picturesque and very beautiful. When her own tragedy comes and, in the midst of the great scene of perhaps Media, the "great actress," goes blind, the heroine's acting is remarkably vivid. As she sits near the window in her beautiful apartment under the shadow of her own calamity she seems to make a more tragic picture than even the Grecian heroine, for she has led up to it very convincingly. Every scene is picturesque in a big way and the final is very emotional as well, for she has found her husband whom she loves. Before the curtain falls we see that they are happy together.

"The Drawn Curtain" (Gaumont).—In this love story the heroine dies of joy when re-united with her lover. The principal feature is the contrast shown by the throng of merry dancers passing close to where the girl lies dead at her lover's feet. It is a dramatic but rather disagreeable scene. The impress it leaves cannot be denied.

"Chrysanthemums" (Gaumont).—Another of the series of excellent flower studies in natural colors. Others in this series have been commended in these columns. This film is also beautiful, and we commend it.

"The Lesson Learned" (Edison).—This is merely a dramatic sketch such as might be suitable for vaudeville. To see a man with the experience in life even of a nightwatchman, swear-off after he had just taken several glasses of whiskey, merely because his own eyes see, in prison clothes, a man who once had been a drinker, is hardly convincing. The situation is stale; a man helps a criminal, who is his brother-in-law, to escape. The acting is good; Edison acting generally is.

"Father's Dress Suit" (Edison).—This is an amusing anecdote, true to life and pleasingly acted. The father is especially well played, but the characters all are natural, and the film, for a slight sketch, is very commendable.

"Heligoland" (Eclipse).—One may get on this film a few glimpses of one of the most interesting islands in the North Sea. There is so little of it that we can hardly commend it as a very instructive film. What there is of it is interesting. One point: In showing pictures of a port, the camera-man usually takes the disembarking scenes. We've seen, by this time, disembarking of many kinds.

"The Young Interne" (Eclipse).—The whole of this pretty love-story isn't clear to this reviewer. Did the girl keep the young doctor from proposing to her, or was the doctor bashful? Perhaps these two lovers, who were true to each other, were both bashful. It is well acted and a pretty picture.

"Ten Nigths in a Bar Room," Part 1 and 2 (Selig).—The difference between a tract and a work of art is, at bottom, one of truthfulness to life. The writer of a tract is so earnest that he forgets the artistic need of seeming to be unbiased; he "rubs it in." It is easier for a moving picture to maintain the illusion even in a tract if the story is human enough for the players to act it sincerely and, while watching the first part of "Ten Nights," this reviewer was surprised at the remarkable power with which it was told. But when, next day, he watched the second part projected and saw the moral reiterated and pounded at the expense of truth, he was much disappointed. The acting of the second part is not convincing, nor are the settings. It gave a sense of distaste, because while it was poignantly moving it was not made to seem truthful. Nothing can be much more truthfully tragic than the condition "Drunk again, fired again and still drinking." But a thousand little lies around a truth don't help it, nor give it more force. When one sees a tragic picture without truth he is apt to feel like one who has received wounds without cause.

"The Power and the Glory" (Pathe).—This picture has in a marked degree the artistic finish for which the best Pathes are famous. There is no scene in it that is not beautiful; the one in the painter's studio is especially so. After this painter's lovely lioness has suffered the disfiguring accident, and he stands before his canvas with its unfinished picture of her, his imagination seems to see two visions, one as she was, one as she is. They appear alternately and the spectators see them only distinctly enough to recognize them and this vagueness holds the illusion more effectively than such scenes usually do. The story is clearly told and pleasing, also it is very well acted. These, with its grace and distinguished settings, will make it very welcome.

"The World's Most Daring Riders" (Essanay).—This picture of the great Indianapolis automobile race is interesting. It is not very exciting at any moment and seems a bit too long. It is very amusing to see Bob Burman crowned speed king.

"Hawkins and His Dogs" (Pathe).—This interesting picture shows a number of very well trained trick dogs. They show remarkable intelligence and their trainer must have been very skillful.

"The Insubordinate Soldier" (Pathe).—This tale is told, so to speak, at a canter, but should have been much speedier. The soldier is drunk and insubordinate, and he is justly drummed out of camp. There's a convenient dropped letter episode and while the lieutenant goes to the express office for the money the soldier joins the bandits and they prepare to rob the United States money bag. The reason why the lieutenant went alone is not given; he probably would not have carried much money so carelessly from the New York City post office to Ft. Hamilton. An Indian squaw whom he helped saves the money by snatching it as she rides slowly past the bandits and then follows a slow chase not at all convincing. There is one good scene; it is when the bandits wisely choose the place for the fight with the soldiers; but the lieutenant's part in the fight is not convincing. The last scene is finely human.

"The Visiting Nurse" (Essay).—This is easily the red letter picture of the week in this reviewer's estimation. It is a love story, but much more than this, for it pictures in a very powerful way the work of a visiting nurse in a great city. It was posed under the auspices of The Association of Visiting Nurses of Chicago, and there is a truth in most of these pictures that cannot be denied. It is an eye-opener and an education. It is a picture that will excite enthusiasm and comment. If a scenario-writer desired to create an atmosphere for a love story that would show the human quality of love, Art itself could hardly have suggested a surer means than these pictures of a nurse's life. It is a picture of militant human love from beginning to end, and it shows in a virile way a human soul made worthy of love through active service. The misfortune that came to Grace Langdon was the best thing that could have happened to her. If such pictures can't make the critics of motion pictures fair-minded, what can?

"Enoch Arden" (Biograph).—Here is one of the most satisfactory visualizations of a popular story yet put out by the Biograph studios, and some excellent work of this character has come from them before. The story of Enoch Arden is so well known that no repetition seems necessary. The best film takes the audience up to the shipwreck where Enoch Arden and his two companions are cast upon a tropical island where they are rescued. It seems to this reviewer that the players have caught and reproduce the spirit of the poem as Tennyson wrote it, and surely no higher praise can be given it. So beautiful and truthful a picture of the seaside as this should be very popular indeed in inland towns and villages. The picture of the beach at the time of Enoch's departure is especially praiseworthy. Besides such scenes as this, one feels that scenes showing merely a little group of wave-washed rocks are not effective enough—they have too little of the spirit of the sea. The tragic yet beautiful story is well acted in this film and the children in it add much to its charm. The picture rises above its small shortcomings; it is worth while.

"The Cook" (Lubin).—This comedy contains scenes that are typically Western. Perhaps its principal feature is the mingling of typical Western scenes, suggesting, at least, much wildness and a plentiful supply of wool, with the refinement which radiates from carefully nurtured women. The cowboys were clearly surprised when they discovered the two girls in their cabin. The suddenness with which they jump at conclusions is quite typical, and the girls, too startled by their unexpected surroundings to explain, go about their task at once. The climax, when the 250 pounds of black cook finally arrives, is quite the funniest thing in the picture. It is all good, however, and the audience rewards the appearance with laughter and applause.

"Athletic Carnival" (Lubin).—Here are 400 feet of stirring athletic incidents. It is a reproduction of the annual intercollegiate athletic meet held at Franklin Field, University of Pennsylvania, not long ago. The subject is difficult from the mechanical end, but the photography is clear and the faces are easily recognizable.

"Advertising for Mamma" (Kalem).—There is intelligence shown in the conduct of this realistic picture of a working-man's cheerless home. There is nothing pictured in it that couldn't have happened. The husband is drinking and comes home every evening too tired to be kind to his wife and child. The wife needs love. She grows despondent and abandons her husband and her child. Her leave-taking is not very convincing. It was in a spirit of pique that she left. This reviewer believes that when she kissed her little girl, who also needed love, so fondly as she did, that the pique would have vanished, at least for a time. He believes that the actress didn't begin to bring out the possibilities of the situation; didn't succeed in making it human and typical. But, as it is, it is very commendable. Where the little girl Emmie, advertises for Mamma, the scene is pathetic and the ending is pleasing.

"Her Spoiled Boy" (Melies).—This fairly acted story is something of a tract. In degree, it is true to life. Mother's boy in this story was thoroughly spoiled; he lacked all human instruction, and knew nothing of life. Himself was the sole object of his consideration. He has good stuff in him. When hard experience wakens him he comes to his senses and plays the man. It's a commendable film.

"Heroes Three" (Edison).—A truly comic idea was utilized in this story, apparently to explain why a pleasant little cottage was allowed to burn to the ground without a hand being lifted to save a piece of furniture, a blind or a door, or to throw a single bucket of water on the blaze. Most certainly the fire was not faked. The millionaire firemen were making their toilets, while the house, like the barn of the farmer who thought he had a job for the new fire engine, burned down. There is human nature in most of it, and it will be a very acceptable film. The three heroes ought to have been soused with their own hose.

"Sir John Falstaff" (Eclipse).—The story of Shakespeare's "Merry Wives" is well acted in this picture. We have the story plainly enough and it's an amusing one, but very little of the fun that is in the original is sent over. We should have liked to have seen Falstaff get ducked, if it took four men to carry the basket, but behind a screen of bushes he seems to have saved himself a complete immersion. Excellent facial expression saves the picture. It accomplishes a great deal, but it hardly can make a picture of so merry a play as Falstaff come up to our expectations.

"Mistaken Will Happen" (Edison).—This is an anecdote-picture, a character sketch. Perhaps the lady who owned the house overacted her part when she flopped down on the depot platform on losing her train; but much of her work rings true. The cop on the beat is also good. The woman warned the police department that her house was to be vacant, but she lost her train. The copper thought she was a burglar; and she thought him a burglar. That was the mistake.

Independent.

"Back to the Soil" (Imp).—This is a strong, well acted picture with human truth behind it. It tells of a farm boy who thought he had great talents. There are many young people who have tried and failed. But this young man was fortunate. He had a faithful sweetheart, and she, probably divining the truth, appears upon the scene at exactly the right time, and unknown to him helps him out of his difficulties. Then there's a good home coming, back to the farm and to the old folks and to the faithful sweetheart. It is very well acted, Little Mary being the sweetheart and Owen Moor the hero.

"$5,000 Reward, Dead or Alive" (American).—Here is a film that will interest. There is novelty in one of its situations. Two lovers have a postoffice in the mountains, where they exchange notes. Without knowing it one of two bandits, for whom a reward is offered, hides stolen gold there, which is found and taken to the sheriff. One can appreciate that the situation is now tense. A fight ensues between these bandits and in the midst of it the sheriff's posse arrives and both are captured. The young man gets the reward and then gets the girl. It is a picture that will please any audience. There is nothing unpleasant in it.

"The Cowpuncher" (Nestor).—Here is a film that delighted an audience in a small city. It is a cowboy love story, with the girl's family objecting, the lover ordered from the ranch, a fist fight, almost a pistol duel, the appearance of a band of hostile Indians and two men holding them at bay until a girl makes a wild ride for assistance, the onset of the cowboys as they beat off the Indians, and then a happy ending.

"The Cost of Drink" (Champion).—This domestic drama shows a girl's mistake in refusing one man and marrying another, who drank. Eventually the drunkard kills himself in a saloon and happiness comes to the woman. The story is not particularly strong, yet possesses a certain degree of interest. The audience gave it close and interested attention.

"The Stranger's Plate" (Powers).—This is a very satisfying picture. It shows a good deal of the character of an Indian, perhaps one of the Massachusetts tribes. The time is in Colonial days. The stern head of a Puritan family insists that on their table there always shall be a "stranger's plate" set. One day a starving Indian occupies the place. There is something in the character of the Puritan and his guest that awakens mutual respect. Later the Indian at his own great risk repays the man for this kindness. There's a good deal of action in the picture; it is well conducted, well acted, and unusually interesting.

"An Odd Adventure of Foolshead" (Itala).—This is the first one of these Foolshead pictures that this reviewer has seen that isn't very funny. It is too suggestive for decency, and this not only in its situation, but in its acting, which is coarse.

"The Hydroplane" (Itala).—This is a motion picture of a truly remarkable boat. The boat goes exceedingly fast and lifts itself out of the water at high speeds to ride on fin-like hydroplanes attached to its sides. It's a sight worth seeing.

"The Broken Coin" (Reliance).—The characters of this well acted picture are simple fisher folk. It's a love story and each of the lovers has half of a broken coin which the hero cuts just before he sailed on a voyage. He is reported as lost and a creditor of the girl's father forces her to accept his proposal of marriage. This is the picture's chief weakness. The theme is worn from much use and seems lacking in power. The hero comes back when it is too late. The scenes are beautiful and the story commendably put together.

"From Death to Life" (Rex).—The great fault of this picture is the impossibility of its situation. The chief interest in it is not what is about to happen, at any instant, but how the camera man is going to make the next event seems as though it happened. It becomes dramatically effective only after the ehroine, Hermione-like, has become a statue. Perhaps this effective part might have been lengthened if the producer had followed the legend more closely, with Aratus's appeal to Venus after he fails to find the remedy that would revive his wife and with Venus's miracle as a close. Greek subjects make dangerous ground for modern artists of all kinds.

"Life for the Czar" (Itala).—There is not very much that is exciting in this picture. The scene in which the boyards choose Michael Romanoff to be the Grand Duke of Moscow, or Czar of all the Russias, is promising, but the rest of the story is very poorly canducted. The costumes are not of the period, and the cast is tame. The background is pretty; it is Russia truly enough.

"The Rescue of Mr. Henpeck" (Thanhouser).—This is a good, light farce. It shows Mr. Henpeck having a hard time of it. It is no wonder that when the hired girl saw him tying a rope to the apple tree she though he was about to hang himself and alarmed the neighborhood. It's pleasant to see Henpeck's smile as he sits rocking the baby in the swing he has made.

"Motoring" (Thanhouser).—This is a sprightly comedy, not very original, but well acted and acceptable. The aunt of an heiress hires a rich man to be chauffeur thinking him poor and he in a spirit of fun takes the job. The niece finds him out and then plays lady's maid and there's a pleasant romance.

"A Child of the Ranch" (Bison).—There's an exciting, but rather circus-like, rescue of a child from a runaway horse in this picture. Meanwhile the child's older sister has been greatly annoyed by a Mexican, but has snatched his revolver and is holding him off. The boys are warned of this by the child when she is saved from the runaway and come galloping to punish the Mexican. It is an exciting picture.

"True Love Never Dies" (Great Northern).—A love story which vividly illustrates the old assertion contained in its title. A girl is forced to marry a man she does not want. Perhaps the most affecting scene in the picture is where the lovers part. The disappointed lover takes to drink and sinks as low as possible. His old sweetheart helps him to regain his feet, and later when her husband is killed lets the former lover know that she still wants him.

"Miss Biffin's Demise" (Yankee).—Here is a lively comedy, unusually well acted by a capable company. Mr. and Mrs. Biffin don't agree on the subject of their daughter's beau. Because of Mrs. Biffin's distressed mind she decides to commit suicide. Biffin has a bottle marked "poison" which contains something for his nerves, to stimulate them. He calls it a liniment for a sprained wrist. Mrs. Biffin takes enough of this "poison" to ease her troubles and, as she has prepared for her burial by putting on her wedding gown and wreath, the situation is not without its humor. When the doctor smells her breath, he knows. He leaves a prescription for a throbbing head and departs, while Biffin awaits results. Meanwhile the lovers, blissfully ignorant of the exciting events transpiring so near them, settle their own affair in their own way.

"Caesar Birotteau" (Eclair).—There's a good deal of very interesting humanity in this picture of Balzac's novel. The acting of each of the principal characters is markedly individual and at least in the cases of Birotteau and of the villain, Du Tillet, they are much more convincing than we usually see in pictures of characters so well known. It was no small undertaking to picture this famous story, but the Eclair Company has made a very true success of it. The reviewer heard expressions of approval behind him in the theater where it was shown, and he himself watched it with much delight. It's a picture to be sincerely recommended.

"Thou Shalt Pay" (Yankee).—Each of the film producing companies seems to have developed a more or less distinct individuality. One of the virtues that mark the Yankee pictures is restraint; it is noticeable in this picture. It tells no very human story and makes no deep impression; but though the situation is trite, the acting and the conduct of the picture show a good deal of freshness and make the play acceptable. Mrs. Steiner, as the designing woman, does better than such a part deserves or usually gets. The rest of the cast also should be commended. The background is presumably Bermuda; it is interesting.

"Behind the Stockade" (Imp).—This is an exciting picture, but it gives the Imp players little chance for character portrayal. There is only one true individual in the picture, and he is the overseer. The player who took the part failed to show much of the deep vindictiveness of the man, but he had no chance. He showed ill humor. He was used merely as a peg to hang the story on. The attack on the stockade of the Englishman's African farm by the horde of blacks that looks like an army of human ants is interesting. The "Little Old New York" (Thanhouser).—There's a true story here of a country boy's visit to New York with $150 in his pocket, and the story is made pleasant by a romantic white lie. It is good to see such pictures of the metropolis as background of a story. One feels that this is the only way to show pictures of a city or place of interest. The play's as good as the Rollo books used to be. The country boy was very unconvincing and plainly an actor's idea of such a young man. This film should be very welcome.

"The Squaw's Retribution" (Bison).—This film gives the picture of a squaw's revenge for her desertion. She kills the white woman, then the man who bought her and then deserted her comes. It is implied that she drowns, dragging him down with her. This perhaps is good Indian justice. It doesn't greatly shock white folks, nor is it very interesting. The backgrounds are great mountains, an Indian village, a park in a city within a possible run from the wilds.

"Smith's Marmalade" (Powers).—There is just enough human nature in this burlesque to make it funny, and one person with us in the theater not far from the reviewer laughed till she seemed to get a pain. Many others laughed also and the reviewer enjoyed it. It's all right.

"The Chicago Stockyards Fire" (Imp).—This is a picture of a very impressive spectacle, well photographed. The film showing it (500 feet) is none too long.

"The Witch of the Range" (American).—The story of the West given on this film has cowboys, a villain, a witch, a kidnapped girl and the suggested operation of lynch law when the kidnapper is caught. The scene where the witch is accused and taken is not pleasant, but it is, at least, characteristic. The whole picture is, however, good and is filled with life and action. The love story that is interwoven affords a touch of heart interest which helps to increase its appeal. The action is what carries it, after all, and like former American films this has plenty of it.

"Longstreet at Seven Pines" (Champion).—Here is a love story built around the battle of Seven Pines, though it might have been told of any other battle quite as well. It is not a matter of the battle at all. It is the love story, and that concerns a Union soldier and a Confederate soldier, both of whom loved the same girl. She promised to marry the Confederate, but found she loved the Union man, and even at the altar renounced the man she was to marry and threw herself into the other's arms. Later the Union soldier was taken prisoner and was brought into his former rival's camp. A letter in his pocket told of the birth of a daughter, and even though hatred burns deep in his heart, a vision of the mother and babe arouses his better nature and he exchanges coats with the Union man. The prisoner escapes, but the latter is shot by his own men. The novelty is in the bride renouncing the man she intended to marry at the altar. That is sensational and so unusual as to attract attention.

"Review of the Turin Expositon" (Ambrosio).—The presence of royalty in a picture gives it unusual interest to republican spectators. This is a picture of the entrance of the King of Italy and his queen into the exposition held at Turin, and of the grand reception room when he formally welcomed the foreign ambassadors and other dignitaries. The picture shows many soldiers and is filled with interesting action. It is very interesting.

"His Last Crooked Deal" (Champion).—Gerald was a thorough scoundrel, but the pretty widow didn't see through him till after she was married. He got all her money. He should truly loved her. When he sought deceitful cheating, he tried to protect him for her sake but at the psychological moment she finds that she too has been deceived, he is a bigamist and her marriage is void. It ends pleasantly. It's a possible story and interesting, but not deeply so. It is acted fairly well.

MELIES.

THE KISS OF MARY JANE.—Mary Jane and suitor Black buy a wife through a spell of fever and Bill was grateful with all the fulness of his loving heart. He sent Mary Jane a necklace and a note which he promised on his honor to some day discourage on dobe.

It happened both on that one of Bill's horses was stolen. Bill and his friends found the thief, and after whacking him into town to a hands free, when they passed Mary Jane on the road with the old wed. He had a drink and Mary, in pity, raised the cup to her lips and Bill, in his jealousy, struck down the cup and never seen before. He was in the ecstasy of despair and drank greedily, for with no sign of discouragement.

Mixed in a sudden womanly feeling which she never had experienced, Mary Jane leaned forward, and in a great shake of sympathy, she gave a kiss full upon the eyes of the thief. The effect was like to shock from a dash in the cabinet his eyes and looked upon a girl who was fair and sweet. He, who had been absent to die, felt the warm blood of youth and womanhood course through his veins. Weaving his manacles he slipped his hands, rolled one of his captors with a blow, dashed the shots of the others, and putting spurs to his horse, dashed madly to the cabin of Mary Jane for one more look before he died.

She found him and searched him in her bedroom just before the neighbors arrived. Her furious anger at his abhorrent conduct changed to fear that her sweet eyes unconscious and knew that his presence there endangered the good name of the girl he had come to love, so he quietly stole from the window and effected himself to be captured in the same manner.

Mary Jane was then being and to the sheriff free. She deliberately thought of the necklace and Bill's promise and decided after this. Then unfortunately Bill found on the discouragement like a mine. He put on the necklace and was to give up their wedding line but he passed the same to Ford to secure the necklace with Mary Jane, knowing that she would chase a man of Ford.

LUBIN.

THE SLEEPY TRAMPS.—Two "sons of rest," finding the stable of farmer Hawkins' hay stack inviting as usual somnibus, decided to take a nap, and before their pipes and if they had been more careful this story might never have been told, but "Pudding Face" dropped his pipe into the hay, and a moment later the two worthies were moving faster than they had moved for many a day.

Farmer Hawkins saw them and gave chase. "Pudding Face" and "Sleepy Sam" decided that covering was better than swiftness, and seeing a mattress which had been left by some boarders during house cleaning, they ripped it open and crept within, and a moment later, Mrs. Jones husband and the tired man came out and beat the mattress with clubs. Then the rent was sewn up, and the mattress was carried back into the house. Seeing some movement inside it, Mrs. Jones declared it was full of rats and ordered it thrown into the back yard.

Then two men were employed to drag it away. They tied even to it and proceeded up the street. Building material dropped on it, horses and automobiles ran over it, and finally the two men left it on a railroad track, where a passenger train threw mattress and tramps high into the air and over an embankment into the river.

HOW THE STORY GREW.—Aunt Mary's pet cat had died. Si and Obe decided to play a box in which to bury puss. Aunt Mary could never think of the cat without thinking of Si.

All might have ended with the burial of the pussy had it not been for the fact that two boys saw Si and Obe at their labors, and as it looked like they thought the men were robbers, so they ran off to give the alarm.

Meeting Jim Lawson they told him they saw three robbers burying a box three feet long. Hank got excited and rushed off to the boys to inform the deacon. Hank told the deacon he saw four robbers bury a box four feet long.

The deacon got into a high excited in search of the sheriff and told him that he had seen six robbers burying a box six feet long, and the sheriff quickly spread the alarm, stating that there was seven robbers, and that they buried a box seven feet long at the foot of the hillside.

The entire population hurried to the scene and dug for the box. When it was unearthed and the dead cat discovered, everybody wanted to know who was responsible for the alarm. It was passed back from one to the other until it was finally laid at the charge of the boys.

The crowd started to get revenge on them, but they overtook and quit their destruction by throwing the sheriff into the mill-pond.

ESSANAY.

THE HIDDEN MINE.—William Hart, a prospector in the West, who, with his wife and child, sought wealth for gold, but found it not, and wained and starvation faced them. One day, while alone, sought for food, his wife and girl, Mrs. Hart is visited by two tramp Mojave Indians who, with threats of vengeance, make her give them food. With the food she did tell her husband and on penalty of harm done to him, she is forced to keep silent concerning the visit of the Indians, until a few days later when her husband is prospecting, she is again visited by the Indians. A third time they make them the night of coming from the house and running to her father's claim. Him in the visit of the cannibis. Running to the house Hart finds the Indians killing his wife with his food, while his wife stands by frightened. Covering the Indians with his revolver, Hart tells his wife to tell the Indians which and to leave the Indians. After this Hart delves them from the house, while he goes back, and with their fists at him. That night Hart is easily dressed from the house and the Indians fire the building. Mrs. Hart and her baby barely escape, but their lives when Hart comes on and finds them shivering beside the ruins of their building in their night robes. Leaving them beside the ruins of what had been their shelter, they wait until morning, when Hart, accompanied by a "scout" for metal ware and other of their goods which had not been destroyed, finds a small nugget of gold and a valuable streak of pay dirt. In a moment he realizes what has happened, he had built his shack over the richest claims in the mountains and had never known it.

THE BASEBALL STAR FROM BINGVILLE.—Bim McGuffey has made a hit with his hometown sweetheart, when he is discovered by a "scout" for one of the teams of the National League. Immediately he is offered a contract and told to appear at the office of the club owner. Bim's success as a batter has preceded him. Leaving his home, Bim has the congratulations of all the citizens, he appears on the big league field next day for practice. Here it is found that while he is a good batter he is too fat to run and is told that if he will go out and work off his superfluous flesh there will be some hopes for him. With wanning hope, he visits a specialist, who recommends a series of steam baths. Bim is put in one of the baths and told to ring the bell if the room is too hot. A few minutes later, when the doctor is engrossed in other affairs, he is visited by a friend, who has tickets to the ball game. The doctor forgets about Bim in the steam room and the two hurry to catch a car for the ball park. The scenes which follow alternate between the ball game and poor Bim in the steam room. The doctor, however, finally remembers his patient, and with the horrible supposition that his patient has been boiled to death, hurries back to his office and into the steam room, from which he drags the unfortunate ball player. Bim is a sight. He has been reduced to a mere human skeleton and weighs ninety-two pounds against his two hundred of an hour before. To revive Bim is despair, wondering what kind of a treatment he can take to make him normal.

SELIG.

THE MISSION WORKER.—Helen, the only child of the Reverend and Mrs. Maynard, opens a Mission School in the Chinese quarter of a large city, her aim being to uplift the poor Chinese workers and bring them to a realization of what a true Christian manhood means.

The school becomes popular among the Chinese and we see them enjoying the talks of this beautiful young white woman, who leaves her comfortable home to teach them.

Among the pupils is Hing Lee, a rich Cutmanian, whose one ambition is to marry Helen. Helen is engaged to Arthur Hayden, a friend of his dad, likes the Chinese, and at a party given by Helen and later at a party given by Hing Lee, amid the luxurious furnishings of a Chinese apartment, Arthur becomes furious at Helen's too friendly attitude toward Hing Lee and the two quarrel.

Helen's work fails, her pupils go direct from the Mission school to the Chinese gambling den. Helen witnesses the expulsion of Hing Lee by the very act of enticing poor white tenants from their homes. Helen's eyes are open at last and her life to the uplift of the Chinese, who do not need her, and in two strong scenes she shows that she intends devoting her help her own people, and in doing so she wins back her lover.

RANGE PALS.—Like the story of Damon and Pythias of old, there existed between these two men a friendship fervently devoid of selfishness.

The two boys decide to celebrate by a trip to town. Upon their arrival they round up their friends and go to the saloon, where Steve is intoxicated. Steve's pistol goes off accidentally, hitting a cattleman, who falls backward over the table.

Steve dashes out, mounts his horse and rides away. As he is riding he comes to a realization of what he has done, and he is heartily repentant. Thinking of poor Dave there alone, he determines to go back and help him.

Back at town excitement reigns supreme, and a vigilance committee is forming to go in pursuit of Steve when he rode up. They took him in charge, and after a speedy trial, he is sentenced to be hanged at the following day. The sitting him just four hours' grace. Asking for time to go and see his mother, Dave offers to stay as bond for his return, and goes off on his sad errand.

His devoted little Indian boy, who has been watching the proceedings, hears the awful news and determines to save him. There seems but one thing to do: kill the horse, thus making it impossible for him to return in time. So, quickly saddling the horse up the hill, the boy then hid behind some rocks, fired. Making sure that the horse was dead, he stole to the corral and turned the rest loose.

Leaving his poor mother in a fainting condition, Steve rushes back to the twelve miles ride with only an hour and a half in which to make it and save the life of his waiting friend. He starts on his way.

When the fatal hour arrives, the vigilance committee returns to the waiting place, and not finding Steve, they are about to hang Dave, when a tree is selected.

Steve has had a desperate time of it, and just at this time comes staggering up, shouting for them to wait.

Then the unexpected happens and a messenger arrives with word from the doctor that the man who was shot would recover. Needless to say, the friends lose no time in getting to the mother with the joyful news.

TOLD IN THE SIERRAS.—In the early days of California, stage robberies were of common occurrence, and agents' murders frequent. His woman, who, upon learning of her husband's nefarious calling, does all in her power to persuade him to give it up.

A hold-up occurs, Jake Winton is suspected and a posse is at once upon his track. A day or two later news of his death at the hands of the officers reaches the ears of his wife. But he does not die; in fact he makes his escape in a most audacious manner and leaves the country.

Time soon heals the wounds in his wife's heart, and she marries again. This time a young prospector from the East, who takes her to his home in the mountains. All is peaceful and bright for the little woman until, like a bolt of lightning out of clear sky, her first husband turns up. The wife recognizes him, and now complications arise thick and fast, and the interest is intense.

PATHE.

OVER THE CLIFF.—This dramatic story deals with a mountebank and his wife and their house on wheels. The little house has been the happy home of this couple for a long time, but one day the inevitable woman who has nothing to do but to look pretty and ride around, meets the mountebank and is fascinated by his easy grace and romantic life. A mutual attachment springs up between them and the poor little wife is left out in the cold. Day after day she bears this humiliation until she finally rebels and makes an effort to stab her rival, but is frustrated by her husband, who then turns her out of his home. The little traveling home rests on the edge of a great cliff overlooking the sea, and to render it safe from possible disengagement by the winds which sweep the promontory, the wheels are blocked. The unhappy wife, one day seeing her husband and the object of his attachment enter this house, sneaks toward and removes the blocks from beneath the wheels. In a moment the wagon has gained momentum and in another instant is over the cliff and dashed to pieces on the rocks below. Shorting down the side of the cliff the wife finds the wreck of her making and amid the ruins of her former happy dwelling place she finds the lifeless form of her husband and his sweetheart.

FOR THE SQUAW.—Maxwell, a white man, lives alone in his little shack on the very outskirts of civilization. Near him lives an Indian with his wife and daughter. After a few months Maxwell, tired of living alone, prevails upon the Indian after a few bottles of whiskey, to give the Indian daughter for a wife. Three years pass by and Maxwell's home is now made merry with the laughter of a little child, when one day he receives a letter from his old sweetheart in the East telling him that she is leaving her home and is coming out to him. All the old love in his heart wells up at this letter and he decides to abandon his wife and child, who are only Indians after all. He drives them out they naturally go back to the wigwam of her father and tell their story, and the old Indian, intent upon seeing his daughter happy, hastens to the railroad station in time to meet the "pale-face" girl and tell her of Maxwell's love affair with his daughter. When Maxwell arrives with the clergyman, the Eastern sweetheart insists upon his marrying the Indian girl with the rites of the church, which he finally consents to do, and the last scene shows him and his little family again reunited, and the girl waving goodbye on the rear end of a fast disappearing train.

TABARIN'S WIFE.—This is a story of the opera of "Il Bagliacchi" and tells the story of Tabarin, who, with his traveling troupe of actors and his wife, are about to give a performance in a little pawnbroker shop. Tabarin's wife has been followed, however, from place to place by a young gallant, who has become fascinated with her and now, during the nonsuite life she is forced to lead, rather encourages his attentions. Just before the performance is to begin the wife receives a note from this young fellow, referring to an appointment which they had made. This note Tabarin finds. In the next scene when the play is on, Tabarin's wife is on a rude stage when Tabarin enters, he is supposed to kill his wife on the stage, but in reality causes a tragedy. So realistic is his acting that the audience with one accord rises to its feet and wildly applauds. Then there is a horrified cry from the wings and the balance of the troupe go to the dying girl. Appalled of the fact that what they have witnessed is not play acting the audience leave in wild disorder, while Tabarin, heart-broken, is led away by the police.

OLD INDIAN DAYS.—The daughter of the Chief falls in love with a member of another tribe and he, by his lavish gifts, wins the future's consent to his marriage, but later in the day the Chief snatches the hand of his daughter and loses her in a gambling game to a wild appearing Indian. The first lover protests violently, but among the Indians a gambling debt must be paid and the Chief's will is supreme, so was he compelled to decide for her daring to oppose his ruler of so powerful a tribe and the Indian maid is carried off by the man who won her. Later she makes her escape and arrives at the scene of the execution, which is to take place at sunrise, and after a touching love to the sentry, to rescue her true lover from his peril, and they depart together in happiness.

VITAGRAPH.

THE BATTLE HYMN OF THE REPUBLIC.—This patriotic and historic picture portrays the writing of the famous national hymn by Mrs. Julia Ward Howe. In the early part of 1861 when President Lincoln was very much discouraged at the lack of enthusiasm and the coldness with which the people answered the call for volunteers to join the army. Mrs. Howe, in talking the matter over with the president, became very much impressed with the need of arousing the people to a fuller appreciation of the cause of the North and the inhumanity of the Republic. The matter weighed so much upon her mind she could think of little else, during her sleepless nights she obsessed with her theme that one night in her sleep she arose from her bed and penned these immortal words.

Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord
He is trampling out the vintage where the grapes of wrath are stored.

He hath loosed the fateful lightning of His terrible swift sword.
His truth is marching on.

I have seen Him in the watch fires of a hundred circling camps
They have builded Him an altar in the evening dews and damps
I can read His righteous sentence by the dim and flaring lamps
His day is marching on.

I have read a fiery gospel writ in burnished rows of steel
"As you deal with my contemners so with you my grace shall deal
Let the hero born of woman crush the serpent with his heel
Since God is marching on."

He has sounded forth the trumpet that shall never call retreat
He is sifting out the hearts of men before His judgment seat
Oh! be swift, my soul, to answer Him! be jubilant my feet!
Our God is marching on.

In the beauty of the lilies Christ was born across the sea,
With a glory in His bosom that transfigures you and me
As He died to make men holy, let us die to make men free, While God is marching on.

This poem was published broadcast throughout the North, immediately the people became enthused with the noble cause of freedom recruits poured into the stations and enrolled their names as volunteers. President Lincoln expressed his own and the nation's gratitude to Julia Ward Howe for sounding the key note of the battle cry of freedom.

In addition to showing the reasons for and the conditions under which the poem was written, this film illustrates the meaning of the different stanzas of the poem in the exceptional tableaux and scenes shown. Views of the world from the earliest ages, making clear and fully interpreting the spirit which breathed patriotic fervor into the hearts of the people throughout the North, leading them to victory and the preservation of the Union.

COURAGE OF SORTS.—Entirely unsuspecting of any impending trouble Dr. Clinton was entertaining his family in his home. He is tried and convicted on circumstantial evidence and sentenced to life imprisonment. Dr. Clinton sees a chance of escaping from his imprisonment and with the assistance of a fellow prisoner, climbs over the prison wall and makes his way to a nearby town, he arrives at a cabin, where a doctor and his sick child are alone. He asks to be given admission, but is refused. His daughter hears the knock at the door. Once inside he asks the woman for clothes to hide his stripes. She gives him a suit. She then makes him get down from the wall, as his return he notices that no one is about so with a very severe cough and pretends to weep. It is a funny incident. He goes on over rocky waters into which have been thrown some rocks. The child is allowed to become the victims of these locks, and subsequently he passes to and fro in bed.

In the meantime the sheriff and his men have arrived. When the doctor is accused of the child's escape by the locals he tells of the good manners.

The mother's appreciation of the doctor's action, then he and sheriff and men go in search of him. As the sheriff and his aides were going away, some one threw the doctor a revolver and made ready for the escape.

THE QUAKER MOTHER.—Mrs. Thomson is a little different from most mothers as it seems to her greatest happiness to see her son engaged in the settlement of disputes, while a mere witness of the experiences from one of these fights and subsequent conflict with the police, she is more appreciative than to see different from some girls, quite natural, and does not seem to be attentive to the boy friend. The boy friend is there to have with her.

Jack introduces him to his mother and her mother does not like it at all, however, it is not long before Jack and Jean are engaged and to the small surprise of Mrs. Thomson, who seems to be adverse to any business or business and takes his talk with Jean, showing Mrs. Thomson all sweet with her son-in-law. EDISON.

HIS MISJUDGMENT.—Lessington invests all his money, against his wife's opinion, in a foolish deal which he thinks will be to their benefit. Just as the deal is consummated, he meets with a severe accident, thereby rendering his lower limbs lifeless. The doctors advise his wife that he must be kept in a perfectly quiet place. Then she is apprehended of his total failure. But as his mind must be clear of all encumbrances, she keeps it to herself, and starts out to look for employment, through which to earn enough money to keep him in solitude. Owing to her good voice, she obtains a position as singer. Her husband, however, thinks that she is growing unfaithful to him, because she is going out every night.

Thus it happens that he is left alone one night when there is a wind which blows the curtain against the lamp and overturns it in his room. He sees the carpet and curtain catch fire. His cries for help of course meet with no response, and as the room is filled with smoke and the blaze creeps upward, he offers up a prayer, and making an effort with his arms, throws himself to the edge of the bed and drops to the floor. And then the prayer is answered and he finds himself possessed with strength in his lower limbs. He arises to his feet and attacks the fire with pillows, beating it out. Then the wife comes in, her transient joy at his apparent recovery is turned to sorrow as he turns upon her and denounces her for leaving him to such a fate. She runs from the room into the large old drawing room and sinks upon her parking case there beside the rude wooden table where she keeps her papers. He follows, and, discovering that the whole house is bare, demands an explanation. It is needless to say that when the explanation is made it draws upon him both love and remorse for she has not only kept him from harm but from the knowledge of his own trouble. He is filled with repentance and begs forgiveness from the woman he has wronged.

THE CRUSADER.—So Roderick rode away from England with the image of Eleanor deep within his heart and wore her colors upon his breast. Her little handkerchief was the last to wave him God speed me and God bring thee back. Beside him rode one, Norman the Strong, who never looked back at man or maid as they rode away, but in his heart a dark spot had brushed ill fate for Sir Roderick, for he too, is sorely smitten by the grace and beauty of Eleanor.

Time passed, and one day Sir Roderick saved the life of a Turkish boy from the hands of Norman the Strong, and the boy became his slave. When in battle array a few weeks hence, amidst the onslaught of the Turks and the Christians, in a rocky defile in the mountains, Sir Roderick is wounded and his faithful slave carries him to his tent. Roderick realizes that life will delay his return home, and knowing how two fond eyes are watching and waiting each hour of the day for a sight of him, he sends her an epistle of love and the knot of ribbon that she gave him, by his slave as a token of his love for her.

Norman the Strong overhears Roderick's message and intercepts the slave, destroys the love message and, believing that he has killed the carrier, mounts his horse and rides away toward England's shore and Eleanor.

Her eyes are the first to see his steed winding its way along the dusty road. "News from the Holy Land," are the words that ring through the castle. Soon Norman the Strong is kneeling at her feet, but at his words the smile dies from her lips and when he speaks of he that Sir Roderick is dead, hope dies in her eyes and the world has no joy for her now. Norman still piles his suit and her father urgently urges the match, and it is thus that Eleanor consents to be his bride.

But on the day of the wedding, Sir Roderick's slave arrives and confronts Norman the Strong with the knot of blue and white ribbon and tells the truth, bringing back joy into Eleanor's life and Sir Norman never again entered the halls of the castle.

At the close of the picture we find the two lovers united in their love and faith.

HOW WILLIE RAISED TOBACCO.—That William is the pampered son of a very wealthy father and devoted mother is a fact that is well known to the neighbors and also to the members of his club.

His chief aspiration in life, up to the opening of the picture, was in following the line of least resistance, his energy was mostly exercised in sleeping as much as possible, a fact that his father forcibly realized on his return home one day when Willie was peacefully sleeping on the sofa, while his mother and sister calmly watched him. At last the old man's wrath was wrought up to the point where he tells his son in plain English that he must do something and Willie, taking the hint, decided to go to Cuba and raise tobacco. He is laughed at by all for the suggestion, but William's heart is set upon showing that he is worth something after all.

On his arrival in Cuba he at once proceeds to investigate the tobacco industry in all its branches, from the ground up to the mouth, as it were. He visits vast tobacco plantations, asks all sorts of questions and then ranks himself to a tobacco factory, inspects the manufacture of "The Queen's Herb," into cigars, but ever Will here meets his Waterloo in a pair of laughing eyes, whose looks riddle his heart and shatter for the time all hopes of his noble resolve.

Little Marcelite, the factory girl, leads him a merry chase. At last he induces her to dine with him and he, good Will, finds that pride comes before a fall. By the co-operation of Marcelite' Cuban cousin he is deprived of his money in a clever way, and when the bill falls due for the repast, William finds he is penniless in so far as he knows. But the sad awakening comes of the tobacco raising inspiration, when he finds himself in jail and sentenced to hard labor. But when his long money is restored to him he makes a triumphant entrance into his house decked in all the paraphernalia of a typical Cuban planter.

His father's pride and his mother's and sister's love know no bounds and Will is content for a great while. His father presents him with a substantial check for his tobacco raising enterprise. This proves to Will's mind, that he never was made for a planter, but a modern business financier.

THE STAR SPANGLED BANNER.—We are shown the spirit of the time of eighteen hundred and twelve, and here we are introduced to Dr. Beanes and his family, their friendship for the young loyal Key and the doctor's sympathy for the wounded and sick, the humiliation and insult in his own home and eventually his capture by the British soldiers. We also see Key's prompt action in arranging to secure his release through the help of President Madison. From there on the story carries us to his arrival on the British battleship and the release and exchange granted to Dr. Beanes, who is held there a prisoner, and shows us why Francis Scott Key was on board the ship a prisoner during the bombardment of Fort McHenry, which takes us up to the inspired moment when Key first wrote his wonderful first and second verses of the "Star Spangled Banner," on the back of an old envelope. We are also shown the patriotism and the emotions of the men on the night of September fourteenth in a room in a hotel in Baltimore, where he finished his work with, "And this be our motto—In God is our trust."

The following day, when "the Star Spangled Banner" was sung for the first time in an old tavern next to the Holliday Street Theater, there one named Ferdinand Durang, mounted on a table, sang the soul-inspiring strain and words that caught the enthusiasm of the time and the old walls of the tavern echoed and re-echoed with cheer after cheer, which has continued to echo on down to our day and will still echo as long as the future every time the strains of the "Star Spangled Banner" reach the ears of the friends and daughters "O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave."

KALEM.

JAUREZ (Mexico), AFTER THE BATTLE.—This film is particularly interesting and of value from the fact that it is the first motion picture ever made of a besieged city directly after a battle. In this remarkable film the battle scarred city of Jaurez is shown as it appeared after the Mexican Insurrectos succeeded in obtaining possession. You will see scenes where the most desperate fighting during the 19th century took place, showing the wreck and destruction caused by the Insurrecto's cannon, powerful machine guns and dynamite. Another interesting incident is a picture caught by the photographer of Red Lopez, a notorious outlaw, who was recently tried, convicted of desertion, and sentenced to be confined in prison for eight years, and shot while trying to escape. Another picturesque sight is the ragged clad Insurrecto Army, armed to the teeth with guns and revolvers, captured from the Federals. Of great interest is the church of Guadalupe, over 400 years old. Back of this church the Federals made their last stand and put up an awful fight. We next see the ruined Post Office, one time home of the patriotic President Benito Jaurez. The Custom House is of historical interest to Americans, as it was here President Taft and Ex-President Diaz met and dined. The first foreign territory ever visited by an American president during his term of office.

THE JOLLIER.—This lively comedy shows Frederick Jollier as Papa, at his best. Bertie, owing to jolly Papa, but it don't go. Although instructed to spend his evenings at home, Bertie takes a joy ride and another jolly finds that the evening home after this escapade, he is caught by his Papa, who tells him it is about time for him to go to work. The next morning he starts the game going by jollying the stenographer and she quits. Dad advertises for a new stenographer and Bertie, a strong-minded young woman, sees the advertisement and gets the job. The following day Papa leaves town, putting Ruth in charge of the business. Bertie knows better than to try and Jolly the new stenographer, but she makes a great hit jollying the factory girls, until Ruth has him fired bodily from the premises. On Papa's return he fones him to go right up to the office and asks her to become his wife. Bertie, entering the office a few minutes later, begs Papa to discharge Ruth and is surprised that she refuses his help. Papa says that "She will be a good mother to you, Bertie."

THE LITTLE SOLDIER OF '64.—Gabe, a Southern backwoodsman, sees the massing of troops, and realizes that a great battle is imminent. Cautiously mounting a dead horse in an old fashioned mould, he shoulders his rifle and goes to the recruiting office in the village and enlists. Arriving at his young wife, pleads to go with him, but being denied, determines to follow. Searching through the garret, Mattie finds a boy's outfit, and in a quickly done, cuts her hair off short, mounts a horse and rides to where the volunteers are. While riding toward the ferry she has a narrow escape from a company of Federal scouts, but unrecognized by her disguise, succeeds in joining the recruits. The Federal army approaching in overwhelming numbers, the raw recruits are immediately rushed into battle. This action being concluded in a most thrilling artillery duel between Confederate and Union batteries, Gabe, one of the thickest of the fight, is badly wounded, but when about to be run through by a Union soldier, Mattie fortunately arrives on the scene and saves his life by shooting the Yankee soldier. After the battle Mattie finds her husband in the field hospital, where he has just suffered the loss of an arm. After many days of suffering Gabe finally convalesces and he and his faithful little wife return to peaceful valley.

Fifty years later we find them sitting on the lawn in the front of their home on the Fourth of July morning. Mattie brings out the old flag of the Southern Confederacy, which they both reverently kiss. As they raise their heads a little grandchild, a tot of about three and one half years old, comes through the door and down the steps waving the stars and stripes. The old veteran takes the little child in his arms, while the aged pair solemnly salute their country's flag.

COURTING ACROSS THE COURT.—A pretty girl was very proud of her mother, who had achieved fame as a lawyer, but she had no desire to follow in Mamma's footsteps. In fact, her one ambition was to wed a most presentable young man, who had a fortune, a sweet disposition and a desire to make her his wife and insure her happiness for the rest of her life.

But the mother did not see it. She wanted her child to become famous in legal circles and objected to her choice of an idle young man even though he was a fine young fellow.

The mother's law offices were in a large building, and the soldier, being romantic and persistent, was determined to be near the girl he loved. When he found that a suite across the court was for rent he promptly hired it and every day managed to find no more one for a business office than a Miss Smarty by the Canadian Islands but he runs from the race tracks.

The new business man was very suave for a time. He was able to exchange loving glances with his sweetheart, and in his idle moments he tied his handkerchief and cigarettes to counter flip. And the soldier-lover saw some of the attentions of his opposition than ever.

The Suffragettes were having a big parade and the mother was invited to join in the throng. She accepted with alacrity and the accompanying parade, much to lone wife, the daughter remained to go along. Of course danger led up to a subsequent rescue.

On their way out, two men met the girl once, man who had followed them in response to a Q. T. call. One of the men was the one who saved to join the merry throng, but declined. He had another engagement. He was astonished to run to a Matadian face, and thereby sank head first out in favor.

The ninth went to the Magazine room and was it. The girl went to the Suffragettes' parade and walked it. But when a good chance came, she slipped out of line and behind the throng that cheered her successors. More cheers from the onlookers, and pleased with his handiwork, she consented to become his wife at once, and we ignore the wishes of her home. Court of Appeals

The motion and some of her Suffragette friends were celebrating their victory by a meeting in the mother's office when they chanced to look across the court and saw something that made them gasp.

When you see a couple standing before a minister, when he closes his book, congratulate them, and then kiss, what would you think?

The answer is of course, that in this particular family, there is only ONE female who would do that ONE the MOTHER. For daughter never graduated but became a supply and continued to.

LORNA DOONE.—Lorna Dugal, the little daughter of an English nobleman, is carried off by her father's enemies, the Doones, when she is five years old. Sir Ensor Dugal had been banished from court, and he and his family had established themselves in a well protected valley, cowering outlaws and highwaymen. To this den of outlaws little Lorna is carried, partly for revenge, and partly in the hope that when she grew to womanhood she would be forced into marriage with one of the Doones, who would then secure her fortune.

John Ridd, from a cliff, has witnessing from school days the happiness which being entered off by the Doones, and at once becomes interested in Lorna. Their friendship continues.

Despite the fact that he is the age of sixteen, John Ridd has managed to become his wife. By a severe fight he becomes the head of the family at the age of sixteen, and Lorna, age 15, becomes his wife. Here we trace something of being emotional then are attracted to the scene of the process. Here we see the wisdom of their parents and friends. Lorna is engaged to a man of wealth and social position, but engaged to a man of wealth and social position, but engaged to a man of wealth and social position, but of the week. Becoming a leading social light Bill decides to give a social affair and the readings of his numerous letters with his private blanks are exciting a row, and Bill becomes one of Chaos in the neighborhood. At various times during the action Bill succeeds in pleasing out the blanks. This leads to the final scene in the gymnasium, where Bill is given a big ball to knock, and Bill follows his regular procedure but the difficulty is encountered and it is a very wild and pale Bill who is assisted to bed.

AT SUNSET RANCH.—Bob Spencer had come East merely to settle his uncle's estate, but now, as the climate did not agree with him, and everything was satisfactorily settled the young man was only too eager to again try his fortunes in the West.

Arriving at a small station, about a hundred miles from where he had formerly located, Bob made his way to the hotel. Here, to the amusement of the boys, the "tenderfoot" was commanded by Big Bill to dance. However, he quickly and deftly did Bob extract the cartridges from the bully's gun that he had not only won the admiration of all present, but likewise an offer from Dick Crawford to work on their ranch.

As a result Bob readily won the elder Crawford's approval; but when the latter discovered the young man making love to his daughter, Jessie, the wrath of the man was high time to send Bob from the place. In vain did the girl plead, for John Crawford was a stern parent; so much so, in fact, that even Dick preferred still owing Big Bill his I. O. U. gambling debt, rather than ask his father.

Growing impatient, Bill personally presented the I. O. U. to John Crawford, who showed him the door. Then the burly old ranchman calmly helped his wife and daughter into the buck-board, and betook himself to the barn—leaving Bill to his own thoughts.

The coast was clear and the bully had seen where the safe key had been placed,—why not pay himself and leave the I. O. U. in its place? Hurrying to the door, he darted inside, but not before Bob, who had come from the back house to bid his sweetheart good-bye, observed Big Bill's strange movements and removed to eaves fagtie. As soon as ex-Plantation's new manor, Bob paid the L. O. L. from his own pocket, sent Bim on his way, and was about to replace the money in the safe, when John Crawford entered, to arouse the young man of attempted robbery. Refusing to listen to an explanation, he sent his son-in-law to call the others from the cowboy then and there, and the other set sprung upon him, but in the struggle, the gun was discharged, wounding the old man. Big Bill's wife rushed from the house in to the scene. Bob hastened away for a doctor, while the ranchman pointed out the shadows and lived up to living the cowboys to his side. Allowing back to dress his wife, the old man told the whole to a man case after Bob, whom they soon overtook and brought back to the ranch.

Here Bob and Ed L. together with Big Bill's evidence for he had returned when he saw Bob in trouble—and cleared himself, but not before he convinced John Crawford to regard him as a future son-in-law.

JUST HIS LUCK.—"I'll marry the one who proves himself a hero," said Daisy Sharp to Ed Kidder and Joe Getter, her two admirers.

Determined that he would be the one, Ed hastened to Bill Beeke's room, and soon succeeded in hiring that worthy to act as a burglar at the Sharp residence that evening. Then, at the time planned, Ed planned to appear and capture the desperate criminal, thereby winning Daisy's heart and hand of the obnoxious but capitalistic Dales.

Creeping around the house, the pair considered themselves fortunate in finding the sliding room window open little suspecting that Big Bessey, a real burglar had just entered. Seconds had Ed effected entry, however, when he espied Daisy's side table, sending vases and dishes crashing to the floor but as they turned to flee, looked into the barrel of a revolver, for finding their actions suspicious, the policeman on the beat stepped for assistance, and they followed the unwelcome men to the window.

In vain did he attempt to explain; the officer would hear none of it, but quickly marched them off to the station-house.

In the meanwhile, Big Bloods, having heard the crash in the dining room, decided to make his exit through a front room, and by so doing, barked straight into the arms of Joe Getter, who had remained to spend the evening with Daisy. So completely was the burglar taken by surprise, that Joe was able to disarm him and hold him until the other officers arrived.

The general disturbance brought old Capt. Sharp from his room, and upon learning that Joe had captured a really desperate character, he gladly handed the "bear" the laughing and happy Daisy.

New England

Mr. Jack Dolan, proprietor of the prosperous Lyric Theater, Dover, N. H., is behind the statement that the Buffalo Bill pictures exhibited in the Lyric June 1-3, were directly responsible for the three largest day's business since the house opened. W. E. Greene's Independent service and vaudeville from the Merrill Amusement Company, are the regular offerings at this house. On May 29, Mr. Dolan ran a moving picture show at Central Park, near Dover, and played to slightly in excess of 2,000 people. The Lyric is one of the coolest and best playing houses in New Hampshire. Mostly due to Manager Dolan's efforts to keep everything in high-class shape.

Peaks Island, Maine, a well known summer resort, drawing people from every State, is to have a theater this summer, with moving pictures as the attraction. The house is located in Greenwood Gardens.

Worcester, Mass., has joined the fast growing number of New England cities using the cinematograph in churches, as the First Baptist Church has bought a moving picture machine, which will be in operation every night with the exception of Saturdays. The Rev. Foster believes he can reach the young folks of his city better by the means of moving pictures than by any other agency. The church should pay a liberal fee to the city, if it continues to run the entertainment six nights weekly. Local picture interests are wondering whether this institution will affect their box-office totals.

F. L. Brown, formerly manager of several Boston moving picture theaters, and recently in charge of the Casino Theater, Providence, R. I., has closed that house over the summer, during which some alterations and improvements will be made. The Casino will reopen early in August, playing moving pictures and vaudeville. Mr. Browne will manage the house next season, according to present plans. The Casino has had a satisfactory season.

Rutland, Vermont, has a new airdome, playing "pop" vaudeville and pictures. Mr. T. A. Boyle, manager of the Rutland Opera House, is the chief promoter, and has Messrs. Quebec and Hanrahan associated with him on the venture. An orchestra of seven pieces, vaudeville and pictures comprise the bill, which runs from 7 to 11 evening, weather permitting. The airdome can accommodate immense gatherings, being slightly over 100 square feet in area. Admission prices will be fixed at ten and twenty cents. Whenever the weather becomes inclement the Opera House, managed by T. A. Boyle, will be used for the show. Vermont has been unusually slow in trying out airdomes for summer and should prove to be a winner. It is expected that more will follow. Since its opening day, May 30, all reports are to the effect that the airdome is doing splendid work.

Providence, R. I., has recently passed the Beckman Bill, which changes the general laws in force regarding the showing of films. For the benefit of exhibitors in Rhode Island, the provisions of the Beckman Law follow: No theater shall have an open court or space in the rear, and on the side not bordering on the street, where said building is located on a corner lot, and on the rear and both sides of the building where there is but one frontage on the street. This means that theaters must have an open passageway entirely around the building. A theater now in the process of erection on Union and Worcester Streets, Providence has been "bumped" by the new legislation, and this theater will be forced to reconstruct some portions of the building before a license may be granted. Moving picture theaters are under the same rules.

The Central Square Theater Massachusetts Avenue, Cambridge, Mass., has a new lessee in the person of Mr. I. W. Smith. HENRY.

Harrisburg, Pa.

The new Summit Theater opened under the management of W. N. Miller to capacity business Saturday, June 10, despite the threatening weather. The summit is a pretty little theater seating 300 fitted with Andrews chairs and well ventilated. The building was built expressly for moving pictures.

The New Victoria, under the management of George Brothers, opened with Reed Howes in Dollars to Doughnuts business. This is one of the finest photoplay theaters in the State. Correspondent hopes to furnish photos of this house in the near future.

Something of delight flooded the eyeballs and the music responded at the moving picture entertainment provided by Maxwell H. Hite at Steelton, and the Rockford Amusement Company at Hummelstown. These work shown were of rare and most interested stamp, the whole scenario has been for the purpose of pleasing. When Mr. Hite and the Amusement Company went to be so good to it. Mr. Hite recommend that we should give such an entertainment, can't doubt it.

Maxwell H. Hite has recently succeeded in operation to allow a stereopticon exhibition from Mr. Moore who Penn. for the entertainment of future moving pictures at the State Sanitarium. The exhibition will consist of two reels of films and 200 slides entitled "Where are Tomorrows." Mr. Hite is donating considerable time in giving free entertainments to the poor and afflicted people of his home State.

ESTABLISHED 1879 Manufacturers McCormick Bldg., Chicago, Ill.

Washington, D. C.

There is some dissatisfaction among the moving picture houses since the recent changes made at the General Film Exchange which has resulted in some of the Licensed theaters turning to Independent service. There have been complaints of indifference, of poor service, of too many "repeats" for big rentals, rise in prices, or a fear of it, etc. One manager expressed his turn to the Independents as being "forced to it" if he wished to run a picture house and make money. In some cases it is a matter of "quality" as to whether a house is Independent or Licensed, without prejudice as to maker. There is a feeling with some managers, that the proposed increase in rentals of films by the Licensed exchange is to cripple the small houses, so as to leave the field clear to the large houses.

Within the past few days the Mack Film Service has come into the Independent ranks under the management of W. R. Mack, formerly with the General Film Exchange, and before that time with Tom Moore Film Service, which was purchased by the General Company.

There has been some urgency among exhibitors for Tom Moore himself to enter the Independents as a renter, but nothing has come of this, though the Moore Film Service was well known in this city and many states for a number of years. Exactly what will be the outcome of the present "film storm" here, it is not possible to determine just now. At all events, the Independents are receiving some new recruits and there is a possibility of others joining the forces in the near future.

A 35,000 ventilation and cooling plant is being installed in the Cosmos, the largest of the Bryl-awski chain of houses. The most improved system is being used, which consists of two large air-washing tanks, one located at each end of the building, which will use 7,200 gallons of water an hour. By this means, 5,000 cubic feet of air, at 60 degrees, will be circulated a minute in the auditorium. The many large wall fans, the ventilating shafts, and exhaust fans, with which the Cosmos has always been equipped, will also be brought into service in conjunction with the new cooling plant, making the auditorium stand unlquely among the "local theaters as being installed with the most progressive cooling and ventilating plant of its kind.

Jack Allman, of New York, has been exhibiting his beautiful tenor in Irish songs at the Plaza. The Metropolitan Quartette is also on the program at this theater, while members of the U. S. Marine Band are furnishing the orchestral music. Manager Moore of this theater, has just installed a series of in-taking, side-wall and exhaust fans to the amount of $500. The effect is a delightfully cool theater, which invites the weary, downtown men, women and children.

The Ortho Film Company was granted the exclusive privilege of taking the Military Field Mass recently celebrated on the grounds near the Washington Monument and White House as a tribute to the dead soldiers of the Spanish war. About 8,000 feet of film was secured by the five camera men stationed at various points. Sig. G. Boernstein, manager of the Washington Film Company, assisted in this work, being assigned to the difficult part of taking President Taft as he came to the service and left in his large auto with his aide and the secret service men, and the Mass itself, with all its ceremonies. This will be an interesting film, having the many sides of military, religious, official, historical and educational. A long procession of priests, officials, diplomats, Spanish war veterans, Knights of Columbus, and a large concourse of citizens, will be seen on this film. The photographic work is considered very good and sufficient material has been gathered to make several reels, which will soon be ready for release. This will be an exceptional piece of work from the Ortho Company.

About every airdome in town suffered some damage from a severe storm which visited the city recently. The combined losses were heavy, but some were ready for the night performances. Perhaps the Trianon Theater and park suffered the most damage, since the roof was taken off the building, the out-door apparatus was put out of commission, and a portion of the park fence was demolished. Manager Cobienz was in a sorry plight, but he soon had the park screen and apparatus put in order.

J. Boyd Dexter, operating an Independent film service, as well as a large cigar establishment, has opened a renting office in Baltimore, under the title of the Dexter Film Service. He is a hustling man, who is always doing "something more."

The General Film Exchange is now located in new and commodious offices in the Bank of Commerce and Savings Building. A suite of rooms are being amply fitted up, but just at present, Manager Cohen is too busy to talk.

Since severing his connection with the General Film Exchange, Tom Moore has established the Moore Amusement Company, which is operating five moving picture houses, some of which are using singers. These are the Auditorium, Plaza, Casino, and the Sunday concerts of the Gaiety and Academy theaters. Mr. Moore, who has his father connected with him in this business, expects to enter still larger fields in the fall. Mrs. Tom Moore, who was always such a pleasant and helpful part of the Moore Film Service, is not seen as much as previously, but can be occasionally found at the Plaza.

The Empress comes under the list of the coolest theaters in town, being equipped with one 5-horse-power and two 3-horse power fans to bring in and exhaust the air, which is circulated by ten wall fans of sixteen inches in diameter. Manager Notes is always looking to the comfort of his patrons and he certainly is providing a really cool place in which to enjoy the shows. It is proper to add that people seek this house during these hot days.

Owing to the fact that many of the lithograph posters are unsuitable for display in Washington on account of local regulation as well as the managers' desire for something more attractive, most of the theaters have resorted to using artistic hand-made posters or at least to having the lithographs touched up or otherwise ornamented. A man whose work forms a good share of the lobby posters, is Mr. Alexander, whose artistic lettering and sketches of scenes appropriate to the story of the films are found before many of our houses. True, this is more expensive than the homely lithographs, but it increases the dignity of the theater and adds to its attractiveness and forms a certain advertisement that in the end pays for itself. Mr. Alexander's studio is about the most artistic in town, for he is an artist in crayon and oil, as well as the lightending poster.

A big amusement park will be opened soon under the name of the Capital City Park, which will use motion pictures as its chief attraction.

The Standard, under Manager Tobin, which proved one of the most successful and delightful open air theaters last year is again in the field for the summer. The Standard was put entirely out of commission by the recent storm, but the manager was not going to disappoint his patrons, so he secured a handling machine in this business and was ready for the night show. It is the man who meets emergencies who succeeds.

W. H.

In the Mississippi Valley.

If there is any manager in Springfield, Illinois, who is suffering from lack of business due to the hot weather this depressing condition is not on the surface. Most of the places always have a fair crowd—we have not visited the Casino, which has its own clientele—with no extra efforts made by the proprietors to secure patronage. The films runs along in the same old channels, but occasionally some player leaves off popular tunes long enough to render some portion of a film. The patrons at the Royal at least is not afraid to try, and the endless accompaniment of the Imp's "The Forged Dispatch" was appreciated more by the audience than the customary "grind." When we saw the return date of "The Fall and Rise" we missed several ones, but the musical end of the program was not ineffective. The Royal brought the wonderful Hula reels back for two days and had big houses all the time. This house is still handicapping an old Edison reel consisting of that's the most in their independent program. They gave us along with the Trojan specials "The Hero Engineer" minus a familiar reel of handling ending. There is no definite way of telling what this extra reel is accomplishing. The Lyric continues to get the cream of the business, the Vaudette, Grand, Savoy and Royal all seem to flourish. The vaudeville and dramatic theaters are closed for the summer and a struggling park is the only competition. Not even a baseball game in a city of 35,000.

The Star Theater has been opened by the Hunter Building of Carpenterville, Illinois by Dr. M. C. H. Alloway. Three reels daily make up the program. Mrs. Maud Alloway is pianist and singer.

Arthur E. Brown, formerly of New York City, has assumed charge of the Barrymore Theater in Moline, Illinois, and is conducting a first class photoplay house.

Charles Gehring has returned from Watseka, Ind., to the Savoy Moving Picture Theater at Quincy, Illinois, where he has assumed his old position as singer.

Moving picture shows are not good for young people because they are amusements. This is the gist of a sermon delivered by Rev. D. L. Sawyer, pastor of First Presbyterian Church, Freeport, Illinois, upon "Shall We Choose Amusement or Recreation?"

The Parker Picture Company of Peoria, Ill., has closed Matamoras, Illinois, on its circuit.

Beckwith, Illinois, recently had a pleasing week in moving pictures which was good time to please some public approval used the Auditorium has "The Fall of Troy" for Friday afternoon and night, while the Star had the Passion Play for Wednesday and Thursday.

Says the Greenfield, Ill., Argus:

"A famous preacher recently said that he believed more good was done to the children by the moving picture plays than by the churches. 'You can teach a text a lesson,' said he, 'in Sunday school, but he is not interested, and if he listens at all, he soon forgets what he has learned, while the lesson of the moving picture is not only intensely interesting, but it has a more dramatic and lasting effect on the boy. If I could select my own pictures, I believe I could reform any bad boy.'"

"TICKLED TO DEATH!"

The high mogul of the new Alhambra Theatre, Milwaukee, sand to be the largest moving picture theatre in the world, opened his house last week with Laemmle films, Laemmle service and "Laemmle luck." He said: "I am tickled to death with the class of films the Independents are turning out. And I am tickled to death with Laemmle films and Laemmle service." The packed house was fairly wild with enthusiasm. That new theatre is going to make a mint of money. Why don't you get in right by hooking up with Old Doc. Laemmle?

Exhibitors Conference.—The General Film company officials and some of the more important Licensed exhibitors of the city are urging the Independent exhibitors to confine their programs to three reels for the five-cent houses and four reels for the ten-cent houses, instead of permitting exhibitors to show as many reels as they are able to pay for. The General Film company limits the Licensed five-cent houses to three reels, while their Independent competitors may show as many reels as they are able to pay for. As a result of the General Film company's ruling, the Independent exchanges have lately been making big inroads on the Licensed business. At the solicitation of the officials of the General Film Company, and several prominent Licensed exhibitors, the Southern California Photo Men's Association took up the matter at their last week's meeting. The subject was talked over and arguments heard on both sides, and another meeting was set for June 3rd, at the offices of the General Film Company, in the Huntington Building, at which were present many exhibitors, both Independent and Licensed. Miles Brothers, the Independent exchange, was represented by their local manager, Mr. Dawson, and the other Independent exchange, The California Film Exchange, was represented by their manager, Mr. S. Marcowitz. The Independent Exchangemen and Exhibitors were non-committal as to their future attitude in the matter and promised "to think it over." The Independent Exchangemen wished to correspond with their San Francisco branches before announcing a decision. It is very likely that they will reject the proposition made by the Licensed interests and very probable that they will continue to sell all the film that any exhibitor is able to pay for, regardless of the number of reels involved.

Bijou.—Main Street, near 6th, has changed its booking service from Ind. weekly changes to two. It formerly changed Mondays, Thursdays and Saturdays, but from now on will change only on Monday and Thursday. The Bijou is playing to excellent business, and the proprietors announce that a new ventilation system is soon to be installed. The Bijou is the only five-cent house in the city showing Independent first run pictures.

Crown.—Spring Street, near Mercantile Place, has changed its service from Independent to Licensed. The lease of the Crown changed hands recently, and the new owners announce that the house is soon to be remodeled. They will install new opera chairs, redecorate the lobby and auditorium, and add new lights.

Fullerton Airdome Opens.—A new airdome at Fullerton, Cal., under the proprietorship of Matthews & Closson, opened recently and is playing to good business. They are being supplied with service from Miles Brothers' local exchange.

Arthur S. Hyman, President of the Hyman Circuit, left town for a ten days' trip north on business. It is reported that Mr. Hyman has had an offer to accept a theater which northern capitalists wish to erect for him in San Francisco. The proposition is said to be the construction of a 12-story theater and office building in San Francisco, to be called the Arthur S. Hyman Building.

Novelty Theater Changes Service.—The Novelty Theater, between 1st and 2nd Streets, on Main, has changed its service from Independent to Licensed. The theater is new, having only been open about two months.

Beach Theater Opens.—The Dome Theater, Ocean Park, opened last week. They are playing to good business. The new theater is located on the boardwalk, between the Casino and the Dragon Gorge. Half the proceeds of the first day's performances were donated by the management to the Vacation Home League, for the maintenance of a working girls' home at Venice.

Neptune, Venice.—Manager Middleton, of Hyman's Venice Theater, announces to patrons that he has completed arrangements for amateur performers to appear at the theater every Monday night.

Clune's Ocean Park Theater will open June 10th, with first run Licensed service and vaudeville, secured from Pantages' Circuit. Workmen on the Fraser Pier have been working on the structure night and day. The new theater is now receiving its finishing touches at the hands of a large group of artisans. The theater will seat 1,100. They will employ a five-piece orchestra. The theater will be under the management of Clune, Wheelock & Boland.

Venice Theater.—On the Windward Avenue Pier, has changed its service from Independent to Licensed since the opening of the Neptune. The house is changing their booking service four times weekly.

California Airdome.—Long Beach, under the management of the California Motion Picture Mfg. Co., report good business, considering the competition with which they have to contend. There are now nine moving picture shows in Long Beach, a city of some 20,000 people. The company will soon erect a roof over the airdome and open for afternoon business. The company's manufactured films will be first shown to the public at this theater, the people of Long Beach manifesting a hearty interest in the company's productions.

Louisville.

Although several picture shows in Louisville began the summer with pictures and vaudeville and dropped the latter after a few weeks' unsuccessful trial, the Princess Amusement Company continues to accommodate large crowds, affecting a cool exciting, every day in the week, with four or five scenic vaudeville turns in addition to first run films. Manager Irwin Simons saw fit to close the Empire, which was being conducted along the same lines as the Hopkins, and the boards in front of the Princess showed snow more direct one to the Hopkins, "the coolest place in town." The Princess Company has assumed control of the Columbia on Fourth Avenue, but this house is not included in the agreement between the Princess Company and the Majestic, whereby the three houses changing in the former get first run Licensed films. As a result, the Columbia is showing Independent films and good variety, changing the pictures every day. The Columbia is well situated and has been for a long time one of the most popular five-cent houses in the city. The Princess Company has secured, in place of the Gayety, the Avenue Theatre, on Fourth Avenue, and Mr. Simons has scheduled good pictures, together with continuous vaudeville, from ten A. M. till eleven the other way.

The management is also delighted with having secured the Opera "Faust," a Pathe release, and intend presenting the music along with the picture. This presentation of grand opera films, with the sure-enough music, is the very epitome of motion picture art, and it is invariably appreciated by all classes of people. The reel will be shown at the Orpheum, a Princess house, and will be followed by "Enoch Arden," an adaptation of the universally known story by Tennyson.

The Casino, another Princess theater, is showing an unusually wide variety of subjects and maintains the popularity it has enjoyed ever since it opened as the first fine picture show in the city. Only first run films are shown here. The managers are also featuring the Indianapolis auto races, which will be shown the week of June 21, along with the usual vaudeville. This vaudeville, by the way, is made especially attractive this week by the appearance of Cy. Remmert, the famous tenor, who is one of the stars of the Al. Fields Minstrel aggregation, and who returns to sing in his home town every summer. No Louisvillian can be considered a connoisseur on ten-cent-theater vaudeville, until he has heard Cy. Yodel.

The Baxter Airdome, under the direction of Steurle Brothers, is steadily increasing in size of its audiences. The attendance slumped a bit after the vaudeville was discontinued, but the good pictures and the exceptionally good music are drawing the crowds back again.

The Crystal Amusement Company, of which M. Switow is now the president, is keeping up the high standard of Independent films which have characterized the house ever since its opening. Mr. Switow owns three motion picture houses in New Albany and one in Jeffersonville, Indiana, and all have been exceptionally successful. The Crystal Company does not believe in the combination of vaudeville and motion pictures, and employs for the amusement of its audience only an operator, a singer of illustrated songs, and a barker, whose line of talk and only attitude is from part of those who purchase tickets, but also delights scores of passers-by, who cannot enter. However, in addition to the above features, manager Hamilton has secured a four piece orchestra, and is firm in his conviction that there is not a better five-cent house in the country than the Crystal.

The Savoy Motion Picture Theater at Baxter and Highland Avenue, has profited by the few rainy days where other airdomes have suffered. Mr. Bentley, the manager, was farsighted enough to keep his indoor picture show, which is next to the airdome, in good condition, and on rainy nights the audience is simply transferred to the roofed establishment. The Savoy has cut down its vaudeville from two acts to one.

The Baxter airdome furnishes an unusual indirement to audiences in that the performance lasts from seven-thirty till ten-thirty without a repetition of pictures. Three newsreels are the use of eight reels of films. The West Baden, at Eighteenth and Broadway, is still running two sets of vaudeville to the advantage of the management and the audiences. Mr. Stoehr is also giving numerous special entertainments these days, including two Amateur nights a week and the best local talent is responding to the prize offers.

Mr. Louis J. Dittmar, the well-known local manager, is in New York in the interests of the picture business.

Mr. William Tapp, who is conducting the Majestic and the Bijou in the absence of Mr. Dittmar, declares that the fine famous and dividing among themselves five months' vacation. Mr. Tapp is putting up $9,000 for the purchase of the Majestic, an established theater of many years' good reputation, and the public is always assured of pleasing entertainment.

According to Mr. Tapp the amateur nights at the Royal, which is situated at Eighteenth and Broadway, are the best drawing cards of the week, although the management makes no effort to feature them. Miss Conner has said Mr. Gumpertz is doubling between the two houses, and that amateurs illustrated or otherwise are up to the usual standard.

Plans were filed this week for a new picture theater at 2054 Portland Avenue. It is said that the theater will cost about $7,500. J. M. Wentzel is the owner.

Birmingham is still undecided as to the Sunday picture show controversy. Not long ago a number of ministers and church members requested the Commissioners' Board to have the theaters closed on Sunday, and it was thought that the matter was ended. But the various motion picture houses in the city rushed upon their screens, "If you favor moving pictures open from two till ten P. M. sign the petition at the box office." The Board of Commissioners has refused to grant the petition, but the list of patrons constantly increases, numbering over three thousand at present, and the picture show proprietors are sure they will win out in the end.

According to a report from Knoxville, Tenn., the city building inspector has granted a permit to the Gay Theater Company of that city, which allows the management to remodel the building at 465-467 South Gay Street in order to fit up a high-class, up-to-date motion picture house.

T. H. Walker, the vice-president of the First National Bank, at Paris, Tenn., has awarded to Richards & Frazier, of the same town, the contract to build a motion picture theater, called the Dixie. The house is to have a seating capacity of 850, and will cost $25,000.

The Crescent Amusement Company, an organization with headquarters in Nashville and Memphis, but operating picture shows successfully through the South, will open the Columbia Theater at Bowling Green, Ky., very shortly. The admission is five cents.

G. D. CRAIN, JR.

Cleveland.

Your correspondent was partially in error in the recent report of the resignation of Mr. V. O. Woodward from the superintendency of a circuit of picture and vaudeville houses in Cleveland and vicinity. There had been considerable friction between persons interested in the theaters and finally, at Mr. Mandelbaum's request, Mr. Woodward gave up the general direction of affairs of some of the houses. He remains in full control of the houses which Mr. Mandelbaum owns personally, while Mr. Schanckel, of the Lake Shore Film and Supply Company, has taken charge of the houses from which Mr. Woodward withdrew, in which he with other members of the Company, has chief interest. The Lake Shore Film and Supply Co., of which Mr. Mandelbaum is president and treasurer, is not a corporation, directly interested in any theaters of any kind.

The Alhambra, the leading photoplay theater of Cleveland, which will be described at length in a forthcoming issue of the World, is advertising two feature subjects for a full week's stay—the Indianapolis Automobile Races, by Essanay, for the release week, and Faust, the double reel Pathe, for a full week beginning June 19th. One of the racing automobiles entered in the great races is on display in the lobby, and is proving to be a very effective advertisement of the first attraction. In using the lithograph posters of the production for lobby display, the Alhambra is departing from its custom, as lithographs are very seldom used.

Keith's Hippodrome is also featuring the Essanay feature for a week's stay, being of course the first down town house to show it.

In its appropriate section of June 13, the "Leader" printed a second page of pictures of photoplay actresses, including the Misses Lewis, Walker, Swayne and Hailesay, of the Vitagraph Co., and Mary Pickford, with two "Imp" associates. Florence Turner's picture was published in the first instalment, with the other famous Florence, Miss Lawrence.

The Educational Department of the Central Y. M. C. A., has been converted to the Motion Picture as a means of carrying on a part of its work. Two reels of motion pictures loaned by the U. S. R. reformed a part of a free entertainment given in the Y. M. C. A. Building in early June. "See America First," was the advertised purpose of the exhibition, and the many visitors thoroughly appreciated the opportunity offered. A five thousand dollar set of slides, showing Yellowstone National Park, was also included. In the new Y. M. C. A. building, which is soon to be begun, an entirely new plan to project motion pictures and slides and motion scenes direct from the original, to be used as a modified form of the "Mirroscope," will be installed. The Bausch & Lomb optical Co., of Rochester, will make the apparatus, which is expected to cost in the neighborhood of $1 000.

Motion picture operators of this city, through S. M. Hulbert and A. J. Lakeside representing their union, have taken steps to secure relief from poorly ventilated operating rooms. They presented an ordinance to the Board of Health on June 8, which, if enacted, will require managers to give some attention to improving conditions in the cubic footage. They claim that heretofore every effort has been made by managers to safeguard the lives of their patrons, while in many houses the operator's safety and health are outweighed. They stated that four operators died in the past year of tuberculosis, contracted by working in the poisonous atmosphere in the booths.

Another new block, part of which will be occupied by a moving picture show, is to be built on Central Ave., at the corner of E. 71st St. Jos. Albrecht is the owner.

Boston

E. J. Hunt of New York City, has been arrested and brought to this city on an indictment warrant, charging him with the larceny of $400 from the New Palace Theater, September 26, 1910. The New Palace is operated by the Automatic Vaudeville Company, of New York, and managed by H. T. Mosher. It was stated at the time of the theft, that his $400 was the gross receipts of a Saturday's business.

The New Palace Theater cut out all vaudeville acts on Monday, June 5, and is showing W. E. Greene's Independent service and songs for five and ten-cent seats. This change is made as the house has been in the habit of using eight or more vaudeville acts in connection with the reels, for ten and twenty cents.

The Bijou Dream, Washington Street, offered a special program for the week June 7-14, made up chiefly of educational features. A partial list of the program follows: "Play and Playground," "Protection and Children," "Conservation of Vision," "Keeping Babies Well." These just mentioned were given by means of a stereopticon, and slide showing were nesting during the "Campaign for Pure Milk," and "The Red Cross Seal." The program was unusually enjoyable and instructive, and will distinctly in the educational field. Such activity as this is very commendable, and does much to silence the agitators and "spielers."

The Pastime Theater, Washington Street, Felix Alland general manager, has secured the Essanay reel of the Indianapolis automobile races, and is billing it in the lobby. The pictures will be exhibited by the Pastime for the first time in Boston, and should prove a big attraction, as the races caused much interest and talk here.

The National Conference of Charities and Correction held a meeting in Boston, June 7-14. The cinematograph as an agency for popular education was the main topic. The meeting was held under the direction of Mr. L. Veiller, of New York, chairman of the Committee on Housing, Health, and Recreation. Moving pictures depicting the ordinary house-fly as a breeder of disease and death, an appeal, by means of a moving picture, for pure milk, and a story of tuberculosis with its cures were exhibited daily. According to Mr. Veiller this work is to be actively pushed, and it is hoped that the committee will be able to accomplish much general good, both as to health and public improvements, through motion pictures.

Indianapolis

The Indianapolis city council has stricken from its files an ordinance forbidding the establishment of any theater, moving picture theater or other form of entertainment within 500 feet of any building used for educational purposes, save being but one dissenting vote. A new ordinance is to be introduced providing no child under seven years old may attend a moving picture show or theater unless accompanied by an adult. Agitation for regulation of moving picture theaters is being pushed by the Federation of Indianapolis Public School Teachers.

One of the most striking films that have made their appearance in Indianapolis for some time is that of the 500-mile international automobile sweepstakes race held at the Indianapolis Motor Speedway on May 30. The weather was exceptionally good for the event and the pictures are said to be above the average. One of the special features caught is the wreck that took place in front of the grand stand. A steering gear on one machine broke and the mechanician was thrown to the track unconscious. A second machine came up and in gliding around the unconscious mechanician, the second machine skidded into the first machine, and the two, going against two other machines, the four making a wreck out of the ordinary. The film was made by the Essanay Company, and was shown during the week beginning June 13 at the English Opera House, B. F. Keiths, and The Orpheum.

The Hippodrome, the largest airdome in the city, opened for business on the evening of June 10. The place seats 3,000 persons and is an attractive one. It is located at 2165 East Washington Street in a residence district composed largely of railroad men. The Hippodrome is showing motion pictures, and, if the consent of the building inspector can be gained, will also give a vaudeville entertainment.

J. H. B. Adams has applied to T. A. Winterrowd, city building inspector, for a license to conduct a moving picture theater in a building already constructed at 2520 West Michigan Street. The application has not yet been acted upon.

Green and Ryan have received a building permit from the city for the erection of an airdome to seat about 1,000 people at Yandes and 10th Streets.

A permit has also been granted Graham and Webster to erect an airdome at 3227 East Tenth Street. It will have a seating capacity of 350.

The Protestant Ministerial Association has taken up a movement to compel the closing of moving picture theaters on Sunday. During a recent discussion at a meeting of the association, the Rev. David Van Dyke of the Sixth Presbyterian church termed moving picture theaters as "Devil's Kindergarten." Moving picture theaters are permitted to operate on Sunday because they donate a portion of their proceeds to charity.

KEEP YOUR DRUM HEADS DRY

The very nature of drum heads causes them to absorb moisture readily, and when the heads become damp it is an absolute certainty that your drum will lose its brilliancy.

Our latest invention, the Electric Drum Heater, entirely overcomes this difficulty, for by its use you can keep your drum brilliant and snappy regardless of the weather.

This device can be attached to any drum and the connecting plug will fit any ordinary 110-volt incandescent lamp socket. It gives no light; never burns out; may be turned on and off at will, or if desired, entirely removed in a few seconds time. Entire outfit, including the Heater proper, two connecting plugs, and six feet of cord, weighs eight ounces—the Heater but two. It is practically indestructible and can easily be carried in your drum case.

Be sure and say whether you wish it for Snare Drum, Bass Drum, or Tympani, as each instrument requires a different strength.

Try one—your money back if you are not entirely satisfied

As the Operator Looks at it

As the Operator Looks at It

Just notice how easy this operator takes it. He doesn't have to work over a dangerous juice consuming rheostat at furnace heat anymore since the

was installed.

He can control the machine perfectly now with one hand--gets a clearer, whiter, steadier light and can adjust it to any of the three intensities without even the faintest flicker.

When we sold this machine we guaranteed it would absolutely

Cut 2-3 from the Monthly Lighting Bill

That sounded almost too good to be true, but they put one in on our 30 day free trial plan.

Did the machine "make good?" Well, the first month it reduced the bill from $22.70 to $9.24 and they operated more hours and got better light than ever before.

We can do just as well for you regardless of what voltage you are using and if you will send for our little free booklet, we'll explain how we do it.

Remember you are paying the Lighting Company 66 2-3 per cent more than you need to every day you wait.

THE OFFICIAL MOVING PICTURES OF THE 21st ANNUAL REUNION OF

Confederate Veterans and Sons

TAKEN AT LITTLE ROCK, ARK.

By THE INDUSTRIAL MOVING PICTURE COMPANY OF CHICAGO

NOTE: MR. EXHIBITOR, REMEMBER

This is the one great opportunity you may ever have to secure a real feature film covering this THE GREATEST EVENT IN THE HISTORY OF THE SOUTHLAND: one that will enthuse your regular patrons and attract the notice of all in your city who have heard of the Civil War.

Day by day the ranks of these indomitable veterans become decimated, and it is a question whether the next Annual Reunion of those who fought under the banner of the South will muster enough to furnish a parade. These pictures reveal the tremendously impressive and holy influence the women of Dixie exerted—in the building up of a priceless courage on the part of the Southern veteran—which enabled him to combat superior numbers and win victory—in spite of defeat!

QUALITY versus QUANTITY

We have NOT sold 1000 since January 1st
But those we have sold made good

We have the largest and most modern plant in this Country—But we make it a point to limit our QUANTITY in favor of QUALITY.—That is why the MOTIOGRAPH has grown so rapidly in popular favor.

We haven't found it easy to attain a reputation for HIGH QUALITY—But we have done it—And continue to live up to it.

We have learned to appreciate those who copy our productions and ideas—unconsciously, they most highly flatter us.

The Lesson of Success

When a piece of machinery or other article made for service and not for show becomes an immediate success and remains a success does it tell anything of the merit of the article?

Can any machine go into extensive use and enjoy continued popularity if it does not render service that is satisfactory?

If success from its first appearance and constantly extending mean anything to you, you will consider the record of

before you buy a moving picture machine.

In a year after its introduction its monthly sales had become larger than those of any two competing machines.

Today its volume of sales in proportion to those of competitors is larger than ever.

Wouldn't it pay you to learn about it before you buy?

can be advertised to the public as above or as in previous ads: "The Star-Spangled-Banner Special," "The Subject That Interests More Americans Than Any Other Ever Made," etc., etc. The point is that no matter what you call it along these lines, the reel will back up any reasonable claims you make for it. It will interest anyone, anywhere, in the U. S., at any time and will give full value for whatever admission you ask, be it five cents or twenty-five. The reel covers not only the subject matter, but the Boston Tea Party, Paul Revere's Ride, the Redcoats' Retreat From Lexington and the Life of John Hancock, first signer of the Declaration. No. 225. Code Word, Dec.

The Court's Decree

(An Entrancing Detective Story—Released Friday, July 7)

As the latest and perhaps best issue in the successful Violet Gray Detective Series, this is assuredly worth booking and boosting. While the wind-up of the picture is quite happy, the story is not the conventional "nice ending" kind. Indeed, it is so true to life that it finds Detective Gray allied to the side to which your sympathies aren't—but that's where she'd be in real life, and the "real life" element in motion pictures is the one that appeals to the public. Something New in the Motion Picture Field
Pictures Never Shown on the Screen Before

Washington's birthplace at Wakefield on the Potomac; Alexandria, Va., the town he helped to survey when he was 16 years old; Old Christ Church, where he worshiped; Carlyle House, where he received his commission as Major in the British Army; his headquarters at Valley Forge, and other scenes at this spot where the little Continental Army went through such horrors of starvation and cold. Independence Hall, Philadelphia, where he received his commission as Commander-in-Chief. Betsy Ross's house, where he, in company with two other gentlemen, received the first flag of the Union. Yorktown, where he accomplished the unprecedented victory and received the surrender of Cornwallis. The remains of the house where he spent his honeymoon. Pictures of his swords, uniform and revolutionary camp-kit. Some of his letters, showing his signature, and finally his magnificent home, Mt. Vernon on the Potomac, to which he retired to private life, and his simple but stately tomb. The film ends with a picture of Washington and the flag in colors, and makes a unique and absolutely unsurpassed picture for a 4th of July celebration.

Vol. 8 JULY 1, 1911 No. 26

The Legal Status of the Moving Picture Exhibitor.

The common law of England does not recognize the existence of any show, exhibition or theatre unless it is duly licensed. In other words, the theatre has no rights and the attitude of the law is one of toleration merely. This policy of toleration was at one time suspicious and unfriendly, but has in the course of centuries changed just a little for the better. We in this country have inherited the law of England, and the spirit of that law even today controls the dealings of the State with the theatre.

A license is the lowest form of legal protection; it confers no permanent or vested rights, it subjects the licensee to constant supervision by the licensors, and the license may be withdrawn generally at the naked discretion of the executive officers of city or State. There has lately been a disposition on the part of courts of equity to come to the rescue of the exhibitor where the withdrawal of the license has been grossly arbitrary, and thus the abuse of discretion on the part of tyrannical officials has been somewhat checked. As a rule, however, courts do not like to interfere with the exercise of discretion on the part of officials.

* * *

The general statutes of the State of New York refer to moving picture exhibitions as such only in two instances—in the session laws of 1908 and again in 1910; the former deals with the admission of minors to moving picture theatres, the other provides for examining and licensing operators, who must be citizens and of full age. So far as the statutes and decisions are concerned, the law classes the moving picture exhibition with theatres, and a theatre has been legally defined as "a house for the exhibition of dramatic performances; a playhouse, comprehending the stage, the pit, boxes, galleries and orchestra." The drama has been legally defined "as a story represented by action . . . ordinarily designed to be spoken, but it may be represented in pantomime, when the actors use gesticulation." Just what the reproduction by means of lighting devices of an actual performance would be in the eyes of the law has never been determined because the question has never been raised.

The law gives absolute power to the municipal authorities to license or to refuse licenses. The question of the amount of licenses has been repeatedly passed upon by the appellate courts, and the decisions hold out little encouragement to exhibitors. The courts in every recorded case, where a contest was made, have sustained the amount fixed by the authorities. The judges have held that the work of examining the applicant and the application and the necessity of constant supervision justified the authorities in demanding a substantial amount. Likewise unlimited power is vested in the municipal authorities to regulate the building, the interior and exterior arrangements, to prescribe, in fact, any measures which in the judgment of the authorities are required by the exigencies of public safety.

How far the police may go in censoring moving pictures or in suppressing exhibitions that would seem to endanger public morality or offend public decency is a mooted question still. The police, of course, are not the judges of last resort; if they interfere without any warrant of law with the showing of a picture their action is subject to judicial review, and if their action has been wholly unjustified they are subject to damages at the civil law, and may be criminally prosecuted for oppression. Mayor Gaynor has made that much very plain. The censoring of pictures seems in many places to have been delegated to or assumed by special committees, who, it is believed, are fairly representative of public opinion.

While the moving picture and the exhibitor are, under the law, fair subjects for public criticism, the law does not mean to make them targets for indiscriminate abuse. It may be some comfort to the exhibitor to know that where criticism by newspapers is "unjust and malevolent or exceeds the bounds of fair opinion it is a libel, and therefore actionable.

Van Bibber's Experiment.

This is not the first time the Edison Company has gone to the pages of Richard Harding Davis in search of its film subjects. Davis is in no sense of the word a great writer and it was not surprising that in some previous Edison efforts, notably in "Ranson's Folly," the success was but moderate. There is, however, in some of Davis's earlier stories much good material for an American film maker anxious to please an American public. The figure of Van Bibber was one of his cleverest creations and this present story rings with a genuine note of Americanism, not the drivel of the yellow press, but real Americanism, the noble sentiment, which in this newer and fresher world of ours, freer from the taint of caste and social prejudice, holds out a larger hope to erring or oppressed humanity. The film maker wisely changed the original title of the story "Van Bibber's Burglar" into "Van Bibber's Experiment," not only because burglars are not supposed to occur in moving pictures, however largely they may figure in the daily press, but because the film story, thanks to several clever changes and additions, is in every way better, more dramatic and more convincing than the tale of Davis. The story as sketched in the film can be told in a few sentences. Grim necessity drives the former inmate of a prison into crime. He is caught and disarmed by Van Bibber, a young clubman, and incidentally a person of sterling American manhood. Van Bibber believes that this shattered, shipwrecked man may be reclaimed and that the experiment is well worth trying. He takes the man to his rooms, treats him at once with consideration and confidence and while the poor fellow is still cowering under the shame and confusion of discovery and fear of prison, Van Bibber has him clothed anew from head to foot. As the man accidentally glances at the reflection of his new self in the mirror, his confidence and his belief in his own manhood returns to him and his better nature has evidently once more gained the upper hand. Van Bibber's experiment, however, is not complete, and here follows a very clever conception of the film maker, which he did not find in the story and which is entirely his own. The burglar still suffers from the pinching poverty which tempted him into crime before, and his friend in evening clothes wants to see, whether now, rehabited and rehabilitated, he will be strong enough to resist temptation. He places a precious stone within easy reach of the burglar and leaves the room. His strange guest sees the jewel and is tempted, but catching again the reflection of himself in the glass, he conquers and spurns the temptation. Van Bibber, now convinced that the man has regained his self-respect, decides to help him to go West with his wife and provides him with the money for this purpose. The story would be interesting enough if it ended here, but the film maker has constructed a very effective climax. He shows us how entirely successful was the experiment of Van Bibber. The reformed burglar sends Van Bibber a fine picture of himself and wife and child, happy in the free and breezy West and a check, paying back the money Van Bibber had given him.

No dramatization with the aid of the spoken word could have developed the plot better than this succession of silent scenes. It was said of an old-time actor in pantomime, that he could have interpreted Hamlet's monologue without opening his mouth, so mobile and expressive was his face, so eloquent and convincing were his gestures. Something of this pantomimic perfection was present throughout this film. The part of the burglar was taken by an actor, who thoroughly understood its possibilities and who by holding himself in judicious restraint, gave an exceedingly telling portrayal. A similar tribute is due to the artiste, who took the role of the burglar's wife; she appears in but two scenes, but makes the most of her chances, touching all hearts. The clubman was likewise acted with rare skill and discrimination, the actor had become merged in his part. The scene in the clubhouse was a delightful glimpse of reality. The man, who acted the part of the detective, acquitted himself with perfect art.

The audience made it very plain, that it was profoundly grateful for this film. It quickly comprehends all its fine points. When the burglar straightens up under the humane treatment of his captor and again when he is tempted in vain, the audience understood and responded instantly by hearty applause. The moving picture audiences everywhere are hungry for the films of the type represented by "Van Bibber's Expriment."

An Antidote to Cheap Vaudeville

The question of "Who started vaudeville" was recently discussed in the columns of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD. Some thought it was Jones, others argued it was Smith; it really was the Necessity-of-the-Human Voice in connection with the moving picture entertainment. It is human nature to think as little as possible. There is not one of us who does not like the favorite route of the line of least resistance. The vaudeville, even the ghastly variety which camps on the trail of the five-cent houses, supplied the much-needed human voice. So far, so good. The fatal error lay in this: The human voice was there sure enough, but in no way connected with the moving picture as such; on the contrary, it was wholly separate and distinct from the moving picture entertainment itself and very often it made a painful and unwelcome contrast. It is sure the audience could never see the fitness and sense of a cheap vaudeville act following the production of a good feature film.

While it is quite true that the moving picture entertainment demands the human voice, it must be the human voice directly connected with and rationally growing out of the moving picture, the human voice heightening and not destroying the illusion of the picture. To run an illustrated song or an act of vaudeville between the reels of such subjects as "The Life of Moses," "A Tale of Two Cities," "Enoch Arden," "Faust," "The Maccabees," "The Battle Hymn of the Republic," must appear unsuitable to even a limited intelligence, but to supply the need of the human voice by having a suitable lecture competently delivered will strike everyone as a welcome and fitting feature, because it is directly connected with and grows rationally out of the moving picture itself, because it heightens rather than disturbs the illusion. Such a feature goes with the picture, it helps and completes it and the picture often demands it.

Many are afraid of the word "lecture." Some think of it as a dry and wearisome recital by a mentally and physically desiccated person with queer angles, others again think it is synonymous with the stage thunder of the "barker." As a matter of fact, the lecture, if carefully prepared to run evenly and smoothly with the picture, decidedly adds to the dramatic force of the picture and makes the enjoment of the spectator both easier and keener, because he will have the aid of the ear to help him understand and appreciate. True eloquence in proper places not only explains the meaning of the picture, but greatly enhances the effect. Such lectures are by no means an experiment; they have been tried with excellent results in some of the bigger and enterprising theatres. Such lectures add to the prestige and reputation of the houses and win and build up a most desirable kind of patronage.

The average patron is grateful for any progressive step on the part of the management, and will show his appreciation. It is only just to the smaller houses and the poorer audiences to state that this feature is just as welcome to them as to the place with the higher price of admission. Good features, suitable for lectures are by no means too numerous. One in ten is perhaps an optimistic estimate. When such feature films come to the exhibitor he should realize the splendid opportunity offered him of doing an extraordinary business with them. Properly presented with suitable music and lecture these films please audiences far better than the ordinary film and once an audience becomes used to this excellent and desirable feature it may be counted on to crowd the house on every subsequent occasion whenever one of these features is announced.

Plots.

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

What a large number of directors are after in a scenario is a new complication of incidents unfolded in brief form. In other words, they want a good plot, involving new incidents and at least one fine situation, so condensed as to appear at a glance and thus economize time in the examination of scenarios, badly constructed, lacking originality, or otherwise unavailable. The photoplaywright might as well accommodate himself to these conditions and save writing materials, to say nothing of stamps for the numerous excursions of his scripts. As to the kind of plots most suitable much depends upon their appeal to the scenario reader, and he is liable to get indigestion from living too high.

THE TRIANGLE.

Stripped of characterization and settings, the plot of a play is, in its broadest sense, the unfolding of the story as distinguished from its purpose. If the presentation on the screen is so purely theatrical and automatic that the audience fails to see anything in the piece, if the people say "Ah!" when the lights are turned up and the next vaudeville act begins, do not worry. That director will get it where Mary wears her beads even if he does say the playwright was to blame. A good old standby in the "drammer," and one easily recognized as having certain merits, is that of "The Eternal Triangle"—two men and a woman—otherwise known as "The Three-Leaved Clover." It was originated by Aristotle and is as worn as an old Persian rug, but it is still good because we all recognize the situations innumerable that it presents as actually occurring in the families of our neighbors. Woman, lovely woman, is so uncertain! Between two equally devoted men, she balances as lightly as she does her check-book, never quite sure which she likes best. She hovers between the solid provider of necessities and the artistic provider of luxuries, affording a large amount of that delightful and thrilling essential, suspense to her family and friends. She really has greater fidelity in her nature than mere man, but there are two sides to her nature, which can only be reached by two distinct individualities. This peculiarity has been used in nearly every French play ever written, hence a photoplay embodying this plot will have stupendous precedence back of it to establish confidence and inspire respect.

SURPRISE.

Nearly every one who has written nothing worth mentioning and produced less will tell you that it is a good thing to take the audience into your confidence. Be sure to let the people in front see what is going on unknown to the characters; in fact, it can be done in the title, as in "After Many Years," showing a man sailing away and a woman waving good-by, with the villain grinning with dark significance in the background. You are saved all the trouble of thinking when the finish is placarded in the title. I suppose I am wrong, but I would prefer not to know exactly what is going to happen when the nice young man with a frank and winning smile finds himself cut out of his best girl by a fascinating villain with a wad of hair on his brow and a broken cigarette dangling from his discolored lips. I feel as though the performance was over before it begins because that villain is sure to be found out. I know to an absolute certainty that the last picture will be that of the girl hiding her face on the hero's bosom, followed by "Approved by the National Board of Censors."

MYSTERY.

When, O Conan Doyle! will we have one like you to put the adventures of the immortal Sherlock on the screen? I suppose the objection would be that a crime might have to be committed before our very eyes and thus encourage our children to become bandits. This is not unreasonable to suppose. A small boy in my family was given an Indian dress, like that worn by one of the children in "The Little Major," and wanted the gun that went with it or some other deadly weapon. His wish was not granted, but he came near slaughtering the innocent in most disapproved style. He appeared early one morning in the bedchamber of his parents with a big knife he had found in a kitchen drawer all ready to carve the ancestral tree, but papa and mamma happened to be awake, daring each other to get up and see what time it was, and the little tot was prevented from imitating certain characters in the moving pictures. The picture might show the crime already committed or state it as a proposition in a sub-title about the size of an ideal scenario. The play ought to be easy to direct, as it would depend almost entirely for interest on incident and situation and there are plenty of us who like to watch a play where a clever detective matches his wits against those of a keen malefactor no matter who wins. Who will be the first to put a really thrilling detective play on the screen in Doctor Doyle's finished style?

CONTRAST.

Select your director in rising out of the commonplace to the more entertaining form of photoplays—those based on contrasting incident, character or environment. They invariably prove interesting to the audience when well handled, but require the finest kind of work in writing the fifteen or twenty scenes of a scenario. Send no high-class plays to a director holding down his job by mangling everything intrusted to his care in order to make it appear that he is the whole thing. Write as briefly as possible, but do not omit essentials on that account and there are delicate contrasts to be noted in settings, costume, action, incident, and practically every detail of the play. Those who are interested in pleasing the audience, in giving the public the best possible run for their money, are very open to suggestion in every detail of a fine play. A drama is a record of emotion forced into activity by incident, modified by environment and personal characteristics, and the working of these forces must be best known to the author, else the play would not be evolved. A well constructed scenario fixes the purpose in the mind of the director, then, and then only, he can add or subtract incident to the betterment or detriment of the complete presentation. There is not the slightest doubt that most of the scenarios submitted have to be rearranged to be available, but, on the other hand, the average director spoils a bushel of plays in getting out one successful one. Result—what we see every day on the screen.

MOOD.

When we reach the plot of dominant mood, revealing the internal as well as the external human being, laying bare the minds and hearts of our characters, we are up among the masterpieces. In this field are found the most powerful situations dealing with matters of intense human interest, containing in abundance that valuable asset—suspense. A moral crisis can be depicted on the screen when theatrical attempts to show physical danger only cause the amusement excited by the adventures of Desperate Desmond and Claude Eclaire. The dominant strain in a powerful drama must be sounded, no matter how faintly, early in the play and from the first moment that it reaches attention should be continually enforced by every detail of incident and setting at the director's command until the crisis is reached. This form of drama lends itself more than any other to development on the screen because mere figures of speech can never delineate either high emotion or that of suppressed nature as well as can facial and gestural expression. Passion, susceptibility, moral insensibility, irritability, complacency, discontent, grief, self-contempt, love, hate, all the wide range of human feeling in dominant or subdominant strain, are as interesting to witness in the play as they were 2,000 years ago. In the form of comedy, human meanness can be held up to ridicule, or human weakness to good-humored laughter, by using a dominant mood; while the element of suspense, always requiring skillful manipulation, can be worked up through the interest always shown in the outcome where one or more individuals are "possessed" by some extreme mood that blinds common sense and subjugates the will. The principal trouble with such plays is that brains are required all along the line from the initial conception to the final execution, the great advantage of them being that they are universally enjoyed and raise photoplay production to the place it deserves and should enjoy—that of a fine art.

Beginning with next number, the MOVING PICTURE WORLD will be enlarged as to the number of pages and other departments added, which will make it still more valuable to the exhibitor. So many of our readers have written to us that they would not be without the MOVING PICTURE WORLD if it cost them Ten Dollars a year that no apology should be needed for a slight advance in our subscription rate. We are further justified in this because we relieve many of our readers of the expense of subscribing to another journal. The publishers of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD have purchased the "Film Index," the first paper to enter this field, and it will be merged with the WORLD, which will continue to give the news of every faction of the trade with equal fairness and accuracy. Subscribers to the "Film Index," who were also subscribers to the MOVING PICTURE WORLD will have the period of their expiration term extended proportionately. Subscribers to the "Film Index" who were not subscribers to the MOVING PICTURE WORLD will receive the WORLD if they so desire or have the amount of their unexpired subscription to the "Index" refunded.

Kinemacolor.

Heavily financed and under capable management, the Kinemacolor Company of America is now making steady and rapid progress to the point where the beauties of this process of showing motion pictures in the colors of Nature will be visible to the American public. In former issues of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD, Kinemacolor has been frequently and favorably commented upon and a few weeks ago we recorded its triumph at the beautiful Scala Theater in London. Exhibitions in this country, so far, have only been in the nature of demonstrations. Now we understand that territorial rights are being rapidly disposed of and, beginning with the exhibition of the Coronation series, regular bookings may be arranged for in the best theaters of all the principal cities.

The Kinemacolor Coronation pictures will be a revelation to the American public, not only of the customs and costumes of our cousins across the water, but of the marvelous possibilities of this process. These pictures were taken by Royal command. Few in America can thoroughly appreciate what "royal command" means. The only analogy would be a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. Royalty has manifested great interest in the progress of Kinemacolor and the "command" to record the coronation Ceremonies by that process means that Mr. Charles Urban will be afforded every official courtesy and privilege as to the best points of vantage—every opportunity to record every detail of the proceedings. Weather permitting, millions will therefore be able to see in all the blaze of color and all the pomp of action this spectacle of world wide interest, better no doubt and certainly with more comfort than if they were being jostled in the throngs that fill London streets at this moment.

The Coronation ceremonies extend over a considerable period of time. The preliminaries have been successfully recorded in Kinemacolor, and the films are already on exhibition at the offices of the Kinemacolor Company, 145 West 45th Street, New York City. We have been favored with private exhibitions of "Reviewing the Troops by King George and Emperor William of Germany," "The Investiture of the Prince of Wales with the Order of the Garter," "Trooping of the Colors," all subjects which were exacting and satisfactory tests of Kinemacolor. Another picture, "Unveiling Victoria's Memorial," although photographed on a dull and foggy day, subdued in color, but harmonious and correct in tonality, was remarkable evidence of the technical advance of the process since the first exhibition in Madison Square Garden a year and a half ago.

The number of Kinemacolor subjects at present available, scenic, educational and dramatic, are so large and so attractive that theater managers cannot afford to neglect it as an important addition to the black and white program or even as a drawing program by itself. State and territorial rights are only being sold to thoroughly responsible parties who will handle Kinemacolor as a feature. It is hardly likely that it will find its way into the smaller store shows for some time. We learn, however, that the Kinemacolor Company of America will supplement Kinemacolor with a suitable program of black and white of their own manufacture or importation, and that this will, in the near future, be available to exhibitors through a circuit of exchanges.

Under the management of Mr. J. J. Murdock, whose experience as an amusement promoter, has marked epochs in the vaudeville and moving picture field, the Kinemacolor Company of America, with its solid backing of well-known capitalists, is destined to be a very formidable opponent to the two present competing factions.

Impossibilities in the Plot

C. H. Claudy.

Is it because the gamut of human passion, emotion and incident has been run, and the craze for something new grown so greatly that producers must delve into the realms of the impossible for plots of their stories? Or is it a lack of common sense, of real appreciation of life, and disbelief in the intelligence of audiences?

I pause for a reply—which, I see clearly, is not forthcoming.

For certain it is that one play in three—well, thirty per cent., or every other one, for the matter of that, according to the way they happen to run, is either built upon an improbability so great it can fairly be termed impossible, or else within it is found an incident, action, happening, so unnatural, so different from what we know—you and I and the rest of the payers of five-cent pieces—that if we do not rise and leave, our gorge does, and only the hope of another and more reasonable film holds us and our gorges to our places!

Yea, verily, I will be precise and particular—I never was much on generalities when I could get something particular to say.

But I am going to let you decide whether I am right or wrong, and on your decision I am quite content to stand or fall. Moreover, I don't give a rap whether you be manager or piano player, operator or ticket taker, proprietor or janitor, writer of plays or producer of them—even you may be the poducer of Imp films themselves, whom I am now about to step upon, gently, but firmly.

To you all, big, little, high, low, so you wear trousers, I would ask this question. If you came along and found a man with his arms about your sweetheart his hands at her throat, his face trying to get close to hers—if you heard her pitiful cries of terror and anguish, her pleadings with the brute, her prayer for help, what would you do?

Would you sling him gently to one side, put one arm about your dear one's shrinking, frightened form, and wave the beast superbly away, pointing dramatically to east-west-south-north—the while you thundered denunciation at him and soothed your little girl with the disengaged hand?

Or would you proceed to just naturally beat his face to a jelly, get your hands on his throat and choke the foul breath from him, take him apart and see what makes him go, smash him, dash him, beat him, kill him?

Well, in "Behind the Palisade" Imp produces a play which has just this situation in it. Only, it was necessary that the malefactor get away after his assault on the girl. But instead of having him jump and run for it, when Brave Hero comes to Girl's rescue, he cowers and shrinks and backs away while Brave Hero—Oh, Very Brave Hero does Heroic Actions with hand and mouth—lets him go! After that, what mattered the superb charge of the Filipino tribe? What mattered the expense, the trouble, the good photography, the fight behind the palisade? We knew—we audience—it was all bluff, and not all Brave Hero's brave run for help could satisfy us that he was all of a man. For we had seen him obey a director's behest when he ought to have murdered his brother actor. There was the trouble—a brother actor—not a villain!

But, bad as this is, it isn't a marker on such a horrible mess of the truth as Kalem gets off in their superb production of "The Love of Summer Moon." This is one of the best acted, best photographed, most beautifully set plays one sees in months. Kalem ought to get stars and long white chalk marks for fine work in every single department of the production of this play—save for one thing—a plot so improbable that no one of intelligence and any degree of education at all can believe in it. That such a cast, such magnificent scenery, such pains and labor should be spent in making a thing of beauty out of an impossibility, seems to put it mildly, too—well, too bad!

Summer Moon is an Indian maiden. Summer Moon falls in love with, and is taken in love with by, an army officer. Now, we won't say this is impossible, merely that it is improbable. But we do assert, roundly and without fear of contradiction, and we trust our gentle brethren in the ranks of any army officer in the army, that it is absolutely impossible (1) for an officer in the field to wed with a woman with the approval and connivance of his superior officer, without certain knowledge of both of these being more than certain; (2) that no officer of or not minded a disposition as this lad's superior evidently was, since he encouraged the love affair but laughed at the idea that Summer Moon was one officer's wife on each low minded officer could remain in the army and in charge of expeditions, and (3) that no lieutenant admitting he went crazy and married an Indian girl, while in to take her home with him, with his company, or would expect the field, would take her home with him, would be permitted anything but utter ostracism and expulsion from the army on some charge—trumped up, if necessary—very shortly. The squaw man was once not held in contempt by all Western men. It is well known that the half-breed Indian has all the evil traits of both races and seldom the good of either—it is common knowledge that the man who takes a squaw to wife cuts himself absolutely from all association with white women—with most white men.

And here comes Kalem and builds a story about an officer in the army falling in love with and marrying (though we see no ceremony) an Indian girl, bringing her to the post, and seeming surprised when she and he are cut and scorned. Kalem won't thank me for the suggestion (which will break my heart), but if I were a power in the War Department I'd stop such illegal on Uncle Sam's soldiers, if I had to get a law from Congress to do it.

But, after this initial impossibility, Kalem certainly does do it up brown—the action, on the part of squaw and man, scenery which is magnificent, and photography which is exquisite—are all beyond criticism.

Yet, one does make one little wonderment in ones mind as to whether an Indian maid would forgive so readily, and drown herself that her "husband's" path might be clear. In "A Squaw's Retribution" (Bison) there is another squaw-man post, in which Hubby, left a fortune, deserts Indian wifey and gets himself re disliked by Mrs Squaw, in consequence that she tracks him down and sticks a knife into him and his white lady love. It isn't pretty, but it looked probable, anyway!

Vitagraph, after a few excursions into the ancient which fell rather flat, has come back to its own love—its old love —heart plays and real comedies. And in "The Secretive" they certainly came into their own with a beautiful, touching, heart-tripping little play in which mother love and child love, father love and reunion play their parts.

It is simple in plot, as most really gripping stories are. A woman who has been a mother, but whose child has died, takes from an orphan asylum a little girl. The little girl's mother is dead, her father in prison. The woman and her husband adopt the little girl. And, right here, Vitagraph, for Heaven knows what reason, runs the play right through an improbability so great it hurts to look at it. If you adopted a child, knowing its father was in prison, would you find out his name, number, offense, place of confinement, number of years yet to run of sentence, etc.? Of course you would. If you wanted to adopt the child legally, you'd have to find these things out. And no one but a fool would take a child whose parent still lived, and try to make her her own, without legal adoption, or at least without some word from the living parent.

But not this woman and her husband. Though they know inside the picture that the little girl's father is in prison, they make no effort to find out where, or anything about him. Why? Because the play takes them as to the prison to give curtain-raps to the prisoners on Mother's Days. So Father and Mother and Little Adopted Girl give curtain-raps to the prisoners, including Adopted Girl's Own Father, who, of course, doesn't recognize his child because she has grown. Later, Father (real father) gets released from jail and goes to Orphan Asylum to get news of little girl. Performs from Kalem" as the title, which is somewhat questionable, anyway, and of no cause to the play, as here Father steals the information, to be little girl down, and demands her of her Sem Mother.

Then comes the heart-ache and in a powerful way, some well acted scenes. The Woman (Anna Sawyer) pleads for the child with its own father, probably telling how much more one can do in this life and really enjoy when no one else child is for one who never has known it to prison.

When you come to why adopted papa in the Secretive (The Kind Woman) and the Prison Father (Real Father) no your home and think. How do you do? have to say them if you don't want to. Talk about impossibilities—if any one can find out legal information and a woman who dislikes one to a point, and does one request which a man could refuse and steadily accumulate such damaging evidence and all of the things I won't be said against me! Oh, no, you said these things as any woman might think and say to a man. We can even admit a lot of arguments might have on some of which things it strains one severely [illegible] one stop? No one can make us believe the rest of the story. Cowboys become one to three months termed a "vacation," in the style of having a cattle thief. Is there thought to be a rustler that is promptly lynch sent and as the next step no matter [illegible] says he didn't steal the cattle, but that old Witch gentleman did it. Oh yeah. Why hadn't you thought of that sooner? Surest thing you know. Lynch Old Witch, by all means. On the word of the man they had accused, half a dozen presumably Anti-Horse-Thieves proceed to drag a struggling old woman to a tree and hang her, being [illegible] by one girl and lover who arrive in time to protest?

Yes . . . thunder, battle, murder and sudden death—we have all of this thriller, and for those that like this sort of thing this is the sort of thing they will like, but in Kalem [illegible] directors, constantly Yvonne made cowards of these [illegible] and all to what end? To introduce a wench (highly [illegible] to run a [illegible] drama. Ugh!

[illegible] for a bit of a [illegible]. With Longstreet at [illegible] is yet to be equipped. What Longstreet had to [illegible] with why Seven Pines, no one knows, or cares to [illegible] as well been Meade at Gettysburg, or Lee at Antietam. It's mostly a farce to hang another one of those [illegible] scenes upon, but some painted scenery, itty [illegible] and smell of smoke sensitive yet reality.

Hang it, the plot's the thing, here, and it's curious enough. For men love one girl who loves both. She starts to marry one, changes her mind at the altar and marries the other. All go to war, real husband Union; was-to-be-but-didn't-celebrate Union captured, Confederate his jailor. Union man has received notice that wife has a son, all well. Very happy. Confederate lover-and-almost-husband finds note. Screaming laughs. Vision of mother and child—change of heart—big change of heart. "You must go to her," he says to his prisoner, and actually risks death and dishonor the loss of which he gained that his sweetheart's husband may escape and go, look, see, his new baby. Aubsurd! Of course. If she were dying, such a thing might have happened, but that any soldier would risk his soldierly honor, help a prisoner escape, risk being shot himself, simply that a husband might go and see his wife and baby, when every one knows—from the letter—that everything is well with both of them, strikes one as being a little far-fetched!

One shoot and I am through. Essanay, usually good in Western plays, comes across with a rather foolish idea in "Forgiven in Death." It is this. Chums love the same girl. She marries one. Chums go off together on prospecting expedition. The title tells us this that to avoid making his pal feel badly, he conceals his marriage!

Chum suspects something, always goes for the mail, and steals and hides all wife's letters to husband. He doesn't read them—just steals them!

Chum gets chased by Indians, and the two defend the shack. Finally the husband is shot and chum confesses his evil and reads the husband some of the letters, while the Indians kindly cease firing at the shack to let him do it. Husband indignant, but when chum is also shot, they clasp hands and die together, "Forgiven in Death"—and the title is justified!

But why conceal the marriage? It had to come out, sometime. There were witnesses, the parson—did they conceal it, too? Why did the girl consent to concealing the marriage, to such an extent that she kisses her husband goodby, and then kisses chum goodby, too—and last, at that? It was necessary that Chum not know they were married, otherwise there would be no point in his stealing letters, and if he didn't steal letters there would be nothing to be forgiven for when they were both killed—and—Oh, well, what's the use of being so critical, anyway? They forgave each other and I suppose I ought not to be less charitable.

Anyway, until next time, I won't say anything more about it!

But I would like to know what the dandy leading man of the Essanay Company, who is about as convincing a sheriff, cowboy, robber, planter, ranch owner—whatever part he takes—as one can wish for, thinks of some of the idiotic things he has been made to do. One can forgive some pretty poor plots for the sake of the personal magnetism of the man, and his excellent restraint and reserve in his acting.

The Exhibitors' League and the National Convention

Moving Picture World,
New York, N. Y.
Gentlemen:

Correspondence is coming in from all over the United States and Canada, asking for information about the National meeting of exhibitors, to be held in Cleveland, Ohio, August 1, 1911. As the correspondence is growing so large, and so many questions asked, I desire to state through your paper:

First, that the meeting will be held in Cleveland, Ohio, Tuesday, August 1, 1911. Every bona fide exhibitor in the United States and Canada is invited to attend this meeting.

A committee has been appointed by the Ohio State League to secure a hall and make all arrangements for the meeting. The committee reports that everything will be ready.

We expect the Board of Trade of Cleveland will give assistance to this movement. We want every local and State Exhibitors' League in the United States and Canada to have as large a representation as possible at Cleveland.

No one will be allowed to participate in the actions of this meeting only bona fide exhibitors. No one connected with the manufacturing or renting of films will be eligible to membership. In other words, a manufacturer or renter of films, although an exhibitor, cannot become a member of the League.

We will be pleased to meet all manufacturers of films, of moving picture equipment, also renters of films, at Cleveland. Any advice they may have to offer for the good of the moving picture business will be appreciated by our organization. We have been asked if there will be any exhibitions made by the manufacturers. We have only received a few letters along this line, however. Cleveland will be the place, and the first of August the time. We would suggest, for any one interested in the moving picture business, to display goods which would be of interest to the exhibitors.

We cannot tell at this time the exact number that will be at the meeting, but from the number of letters received and interest manifested we are led to believe there will be about a thousand exhibitors at the convention.

The open-market, insurance, express, film exchanges, and all other matters pertaining to our business will be discussed at the convention.

This convention is called for the purpose of organizing a national league, and to protect our own interests, and to establish an organization to show the world that we are business men and a big part of the great industrial world.

We would ask every local and state organization throughout the United States and Canada to assist in advertising this meeting as extensively as convenient. We would ask every exhibitor who reads this article to write a letter to one or two of his brother exhibitors, calling their attention to the importance of attending this meeting, or co-operating with us through some organization.

All other lines of business are organized. The moving picture exhibitor is at the mercy of everyone connected with the business. Even the operator in the booth is organized, and tells us how much we shall pay him, and how many hours he will work, and how much time he must have to secure his meals. The film exchanges tell us how much we must pay. The manufacturer tells us the number of pictures we are to use, and how much we are to pay them for the privilege. The express company tells us how much we are to pay for transportation. The insurance company tells us how much we are to pay for the exorbitant insurance, and after being instructed what to do and how to do it by everybody, we give the public a show, a splendid entertainment for the little price of five cents. More than anyone else in any line of business gives for the price.

Now, Brother Exhibitor, don't you think it is about time you arouse yourself and make an effort to secure your commercial rights?

The Exhibitors of Ohio have done wonderful work since their organization, and have saved hundreds of dollars.

We are taking in new members every day, and are in a commanding position, whereby we do not have to beg for our rights, but demand them. Since we are organized, our business ability and influence is recognized by the commercial world, and daily the moving picture business is growing in favor.

Anyone desiring further information will please write to M. A. Neff, 1003 Mercantile Library Building, headquarters of the Ohio State League.

Let us all advocate, advertise, and agitate, oh to Cleveland.

M. A. NEFF,
President, Exhibitors' League, Cincinnati, O.

The Battle Hymn of the Republic—Vitagraph.

Complete Lecture with Suggestions as to Music.

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS.—It falls to my lot this evening, ladies and gentlemen, to show and explain to you a true film of art. In the dark and trying days of the great Civil War, when the glory of our stars seemed to fade, when the forces of the North suffered defeat after defeat and many began to despair of the Union, a great new moral power was suddenly enlisted on behalf of the noble President—the stirring, wonderful song known as the Battle Hymn of the Republic. How this inspiring anthem of war came to be written, together with a pictorial illustration of its immortal verses will presently be shown on this screen. (Here give the signal to the operator, who must be ready, and have him run the picture as slowly as possible.)

SCENE 1.—A home in the North during the great struggle. It has paid its toll of patriotism; the husband and father has fallen on the field of battle; his sword hangs under his picture. The son is eager to replace the father in the ranks of the blue, but the mother will not imperil the last tie that binds her to life, and with tears implores him to remain.

SCENE 2.—The great president is bearing the nation's burden in patient sorrow. The news of the crushing Union defeat at Chancellorsville has just reached him; the Stars and Stripes had gone down before the valor and genius of Stonewall Jackson. Lincoln writes one of his appealing notes to General Hooker, the commander in the field, in whom he had placed such great confidence, and who had so bitterly disappointed him.

SCENE 3.—To console him in his great distress Julia Ward calls on him, seeking to cheer him and dispel the lowering clouds; her womanly heart is deeply moved by the sight of the suffering president and as she leaves Lincoln's cabinet the weary, haggard features of the president haunt her mind.

SCENE 4.—During this scene suspend lecture and give martial music up to the scene where Julia Ward is discovered sleeping in her room, when you may resume your lecture as follows:

SCENE 5.—And still the face of Lincoln is plainly before her eyes and deep in her soul and memory. A power, not born of earth, rouses and moves her mind and stirs those strange forces that often wake and work while the body is asleep. Like to a seeress of old, a vision comes to the woman who went to sleep with Lincoln's face in her thoughts. In obedience to an impulse from above she begins to write. (Finish picture with a few bars from the Battle Hymn of the Republic, played very softly.)

NOTE.—During the scenes from 11 to 22, inclusive, either of two ways of presenting the picture may be followed. One is to have the hymn sung and played, not in the usual order of the verses, but as arranged to suit the order followed in the film, the other is to recite the hymn and to fill out the pauses with the music of the hymn. When the hymn is finished resume the lecture as follows:

SCENE 23.—The great work is finished; a mighty force has spoken through the inspired writer, who herself is as yet not aware of what she has wrought. As she sits thinking and praying, her eyes fall upon the written pages; she recognizes her own work and, knowing that she has been an instrument in the hands of a higher power, she returns thanks to God.

SCENE 24.—And this scene now shows us one of a hundred thousand like it—the quick effect of the hymn from coast to coast. The mother, at first so loath to part with her son, cannot resist the appeal to patriotism breathing in those lines. "It is," she says, "a holy war and a holy cause," and taking her husband's sword she gives it in the keeping of the son, who joyfully marches forth to war. The hymn has revived the drooping spirits of the North, and once more the country nobly answers Lincoln's call.

NOTE: This ends the lecture; during the rest of the picture use nothing but patriotic music, principally the Battle Hymn of the Republic. It will be observed that the order of the verses in the Hymn is quite different from that of the film. To guide the exhibitor and lighten the work of player, singer and lecturer, we give the exact order of the verses followed in the film, hereto subjoined.

"The Glory of the Coming of the Lord."

In the beauty of the lilies Christ was born across the sea,
With a glory in his bosom that transfigures you and me.
As he died to make men holy, let us die to make men free.

I have seen him in the watchfires of a hundred circling camps.
They have builded him an altar in the evening dews and damps.
I can read his righteous sentence by the dim and flaring lamps.

As you deal with my contemners so my grace with you shall deal.

Let the hero born of woman crush the serpent with his heel.

Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord.
He is trampling out the vintage where the grapes of wrath are stored.
He has loosed the fateful lightning of his terrible swift sword.
His truth is marching on.

He is sifting out the hearts of men before his judgment seat.
Oh, be quick, my soul, to answer him, be jubilant, my feet.
Our God is marching on.

He has sounded forth the trumpet that will never call retreat.
His truth is marching on.

COMPULSORY EDUCATION REMOVABLE.

The necessity of enforcing education has been looked upon as one of the requirements of modern times. The fact that ignorance and crime went together or were consequent the latter upon the former; also that civilization and education meant culture and progress, with attendant blessings, made it imperative upon authorities to demand that education be universal, even if forcible, hence the present-day system of compulsory education. The great question as to the possibility of education becoming general without compulsion seemed a difficult one; to-day it is not! Under the guidance of an acknowledged truth that what is attractive needs no force lies the solution of one of the greatest questions of the age. The power of attraction is such that the magnet needs not that a driving instrument be used to compel the appearance of its desired object; to be brought simply within each other's range or zone is all that is required, and they come together by mutual attraction. In like manner education can be so magnetized as to draw to itself that which is now driven to it, if it be made attractive. The positive power of attraction will nullify the negative power of compulsion. The only question remaining is, therefore, can education be made attractive; if so, how? The answer is an easy one, while the moving picture has already solved. The attractive beauties of the kindergarten method opened a new future in infantile education, as testified to all over the world. The moving picture is the kindergarten system applied to higher grades of educational work; if a boy will commit the crime of truancy to see the pictures, surely he will be drawn by that which he craves to learn therefrom. By this means of making education attractive, great advances can be forseen; and the pressure of compulsion will be removed from the school attendants to the school authorities, in that they shall be compelled to adopt those means which shall prove a magnet to draw, rather than to wield a whip that drives. The power of attraction in educational work is therefore now to supplant compulsory education, and that power lies in the adoption of the moving pictures. If cinematography is going to prove the two-fold benefactor of both abbreviating studies by economising them, and making dull subjects attractive, not only will truancy become unknown, but a more thorough education will be the lot of early twentieth century children.

An enterprising exhibitor, desirous of changing the monotony of "the show," at frequent intervals sets apart several evenings upon which pictures of a certain class are exhibited instead of a salamagundi program night after night.

This proves an agreeable change; it is a relief from "the same thing," gives an opportunity for arranging special—therefore better—musical accompaniments; indeed, in this particular, more entertaining musical programs are possible than otherwise. An evening with the drama, another with comedy, another scenic and educational, makes both a change and a choice, which the patrons have approved by the manner in which they have supported the same. This method of classification also calls for a more intelligent kind of entertainment, the usual form of showing an indiscriminate set of pictures demanding neither intelligence nor culture. At such an exhibition the musicians are always perplexed, as no repertoire is equal to the elasticity of the pictures, causing not only mediocre playing but too often crude incongruities that are appalling in their unsuitability and distastefulness. Although continuous classification may be at present impossible, the plan mentioned above—and proved successful—may be tried periodically, while at all times there may be such an intelligent adjustment of the program that its effect may add materially to the enjoyment and understanding of the pictures.

ENOCH ARDEN AT THE PARK THEATER, BROOKLYN.

We journeyed one night this week to Brooklyn by special invitation of Manager L. Germain, of the Park Theater, which is located at Fifth Avenue and Fifteenth Street. Mr. Germain is one of those exhibitors who is endeavoring to show moving pictures in the proper way. He believes in the educational movement, and he believes in high-class films and music, and emphatically does not believe in cheap vaudeville in connection with his pictures. This exemplary manager is doing all that he can to uplift the photoplay, and, as an evidence of good faith, he invited us to make our little journey and witness his presentation of Enoch Arden.

For the occasion, arrangements had been made for the lecturing of the picture with Mr. W. Stephen Bush, the well-known lecturer of New York and Philadelphia. The lecture of course to any historical or classical picture is really half of the exhibition, and without Mr. Bush, Enoch Arden would have been only half as good as it was. Mr. Bush has the happy qualification of being a poet by nature. His aesthetic spirit is reinforced by a thorough classical education. His lecture work, rendered in a resonant musical voice, made the picture one of the most enjoyable of treats, and well worth the journey to far off Brooklyn. It was evident that Mr. Bush knew his subject to his finger tips. The enthusiasm of his rendition was contagious, holding the interest every moment of the time he spoke, and the tumultuous applause which he received at the end of his discourse was more than deserved.

GETTING LOOSE.

Recent reading of references to moving pictures in papers and magazines, together with more stringent criticisms (seemingly justified), would seem to indicate that makers are geting a little loose in their attitude towards their own best interests. "Familiarity breeds contempt" is here exemplified in the suggestion that in their constant intercourse with their somewhat monotonous productions every evidence of either carelessness or indifference is apparent.

One hardly knows what tonic is required; it may be a "wake up," or a "jack up"; if neither of these are available there will soon be a "pull up." As a "wake up," let it be said that there is a strong tendency towards a return to the early grade of pictures which wrought such havoc among the early exhibitions. A few weeks ago we pointed out that there is to "stand still"; there must be no forward or a backward move. Present indications are decidedly backward. It is becoming a regular "will o' the wisp" chase to see a good picture, and "laxity" seems to be the position to which the indicator of the times points. It is somewhat disheartening to those of us who are using all our energies and efforts to provide the moving picture to meet with so little encouragement. Will those interested remember that candid criticism and true advice comes from friends.

THE THEATER "GODS."

Theaters are now bewailing the fact that the moving pictures are depleting the ranks of their lower-priced patrons. The much abused "gods" suddenly appear as possessing both a financial value and a discriminating critical judgment upon which turned the success of the actor and the profit of the manager. It is an old truth that the value of some things are not known until they are lost; also, what is a loss in one place is a gain in another. A few more experiences of this kind will shortly prove the moving picture as such a universal benefactor that side by side with other inventions people will wonder however they got along without them. There is a sort of change that is progress, and the change in the theaters, brought about by the moving pictures, will be for the great advantage of both.

Considerable tin horn tooting in an "I told you so" strain is being indulged in by some of the people who ridiculed the thought that motion pictures could be made to pay in Madison Square Garden in New York City. Their delight that the pictures have been withdrawn is almost hysterical because, as one of them put it, "These picture people are too conceited about the drawing power of the pictures. At the start of the undertaking, the management of the park stated that for many years the Garden had been an absolute loss to the stockholders during the summer months. The popularity motion pictures had sustained appealed to him so forcibly that he decided to experiment with them in the Garden, and if they could be made to pay he would, for the first season within memory of the present generation, keep the Garden open all summer.

It has not dawned upon some people that the pictures did not have a real good chance in the venture, so that the question as to whether motion pictures can be made to pay in that vast auditorium is still an open one. That the venture was abandoned reflects in no degree upon the popularity and drawing power of the pictures. It is certainly the acme of folly to think of turning places like Madison Square Garden into a nickelodeon. It is a vast amphitheater and its magnitude requires that every sort of entertainment provided in it must partake, to a more or less degree, of a massiveness and splendor in keeping with the general surroundings and appointments. No attempt to do this was made in the recent experiment. The first thing criticized was the quality of the pictures, both as to the grade of the pictures themselves and the sort of half-hearted manner with which attention was given their projection.

* * *

There are more than a score of showmen in the country who can put motion pictures in the same place and make money for the balance of the summer, but I do not think there are more than a score of such. They are the kind of men who have pluck and will take a chance. They would provide a brass band for promenade concerts; see that between pictures the auditorium would be provided with refreshments; introduce singers of some prominence, and otherwise garnish the show so that the whole burden of responsibility for securing your kind applause would not be thrown upon the silent, but hard-working pictures. It requires more than a projecting machine, a screen and an operator to make a picture house a success, especially when it has accommodation for 8,000 or 10,000 people.

And now a word to some of the managers of the smaller places, especially those operating open air shows for the summer. I heartily sympathize with those operating airdomes in New York and vicinity last week and the preceding one, for the rain, wind and thunderstorm certainly put a cramp in the box office receipts. During the present week the weather has behaved much better, so let me tell what one open air man is doing. Others may be doing the same thing. I speak of one because I took pleasure a few evenings ago in noting the ease I particularly refer to. This man does not complain about the "rain" and "cramps" in the films he shows, and I observed that, although the subjects he exhibited were by no means perfect, they did not smack notably of those defects. This is the reason. The manager does not depend upon the exchanges supplying him for the condition of the films he gets. Before a film is placed ready for use it is gone over carefully foot by foot and put in condition if it is possible to do so. If it is not, he demands a substitute reel that will give his work of rejuvenation a chance.

I only realize that exhibitors reading at a distance from the people station would not have the advantage the particular exhibitor I refer to has, especially in cases where films are sent by express. I also concede that no amount of repair will remedy any of the faults that are mentioned at times by some of the exchanges. What I contend is that while all exchanges should repair all their reels before sending them out the managers can better their own interests better by doing as the exhibitor I have referred to does. The idea is to do your best to make your show as perfect as possible regardless of what others neglect to do.

There is a general complaint among exhibitors that the film exchanges are very lax in their system of keeping their stock in trade in good order. I think a film exchange is on a par with a costuming establishment. The costumer who allows the apparel he hires out to go to rags cannot last long. The supreme aim of many exchange managers seems to be to get the reels back to the exchange and out again on the quickest time possible, regardless of their condition. All their energy seems to be expended in turning the reels over and over again to get the greatest amount of money out of them in the shortest possible time.

By the way, have you noticed how frequently pictures are flashed without a title? This has been a subject of comment for some time. I have been informed that some exhibitors have torn off the titles to keep the audience in ignorance of the make of films, and to substantiate this my informants have pointed out cases where Licensed films have been shown with the titles of Independent films, and vice versa.

Let that be as it may, I will not discuss the validity of such claims more than to say that the audiences have quite frequently been the source through which the managements have had their attention called to the juggling or absence of titles. The majority of audiences have become keen study-goers, and they can tell the make of a picture pretty accurately without seeing the title, trade mark, or any other mark. The audiences do not take it that an attempt is being made to deceive them. They claim they should know the title of each picture before the story is started, and they are entitled to it. There are thousands of people who do not buy the daily newspapers for the articles they contain. The headlines are the first sought and then they get down a good idea of what follows. So it is with the picture titles. Said one manager: "There is a man who comes into my show every night. He never misses a change of program. If I flash a story without a title he threatens to close up my place. My, but he does get wrathy! Why? I'll tell you. He only likes certain subjects. If everything I show is not to his liking he does not complain, but he does insist upon knowing what is coming off ere rather out the screen, because if it is not what he cares to look at, it gives him a chance to go out and get a drink. He got drunk the other night. He stayed for both shows, hoping to see his favorite brand, but my exchange was unkind to him on that occasion."

* * *

I am inclined to think that the title question is due to films being sent out by exchanges without having them overhauled. An operator may get a reel with a badly mutilated title and be obliged to rip it off. If that reel is not looked over when it goes back to the exchange, of course the next operator gets a headless story. I mentioned this to an exchange manager and he answered that an enterprising exhibitor will always have on hand a supply of materials with which to provide a title slide whenever the regular title is missing. That is a good tip for the exhibitors, but the sentiment is not logical. If a hotel keeper should tell the exchange man to bring pepper and salt with him for use as soon as the waiter should fail to supply them, Mr. Exchangeman would become quite indignant, I think.

If there is any truth in the statement that in some places exhibitors place wrong titles on subjects, the film exchanges should be able to correct such errors in a very few days. If there is any quarrel as to the matter should be investigated. It is said there are two motives to make the small believe that the party counting to it has some popular subject that is being shown by the opposition house, and to also make them believe that the house is using a better grade of service than it really does. The manufacturers should be interested, because the reputation of their pictures is frequently spoiled by having a title of an excellent subject placed on an inferior one. When this was being discussed the other day the party making the assertion was asked how the mix-ups of a number would has been transacted with can be made to continue with the title upon title, and he replied it could be done by clipping out the numbers and letting the films run through with the new titles on. I'm the winner, I think the answer was little far fetched, but take it for what it is worth.

Eclair Factory Nearing Completion.

A visit to the factory site of the new American Eclair Company at Fort Lee presents a scene of activity. A large force of workmen are now adding the finishing touches to perhaps the most perfectly equipped and best arranged film manufacturing plant in America.

With the Eclair Company, no time need be lost in experimenting or in searching through other factories for ideas. All this study and research was made in Paris by the parent company, detailed designs and plans being sent here for the contractors to work from. In fact, the entire equipment of machinery and appliances for the making of films comes from the Eclair machinists, who are noted for their skill. Fourteen of fifty cases of this fine machinery arrived on the last steamer and is now being installed.

The company's machine shop, however, will be equipped with American machinery and tools. This department will keep the company's cameras, printers, perforators and other devices in constant repair.

VIOLET MERSEREAU.

The Nestor Film Company has made a big scoop in getting for its Western Stock one of the most accomplished and most beautiful of actresses, Miss Violet Mersereau.

This charming young artist has been a decided hit both on the stage and in motion pictures, having met with unprecedented success in juvenile parts in her support of some of the best known dramatic stars in America. Her most recent theatrical successes have been with Margaret Anglin, and in "Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm," season just closed.

Miss Mersereau has posed for special pictures for Pathe, Biograph, Vitagraph, Edison, etc., and her splendid work has caused no end of favorable comment. David Horsley was one of the first to recognize her remarkable talent, and at the psychological moment quickly engaged her to play "leads" in the Nestor Western Stock Company.

The first Nestor Western pictures already completed, "The Cowpuncher," "The Sheriff's Mistake," and "At Sunset Rock," show Miss Mersereau as an actress of no mean ability and a rider of exceptional daring. She is graceful, dainty, lovely and lovable, and possesses a peculiarly attractive smile that radiates warmth and sunshine; she is also magnetic to a marked degree.

Buffalo Bill Negatives Not Destroyed.

In our account of the destruction by fire of the Powers Picture Play Company, in the issue of June 15th, it was stated that the negative of the Buffalo Bill Wild West and Pawnee Bill Far East films had been destroyed. We have since learned that it was a grave error to have published the fact that the films were destroyed, for the reason that they were not destroyed, and were not in the plant at the time of the fire.

Our account of the fire was written from a personal interview with Mr. P. A. Powers directly after the fire, at which time we were told by him that the Buffalo Bill negatives had been burned, which Mr. Powers himself believed to be true at that time. Having so many things on his mind at such a time, it would be quite natural for Mr. Powers to suppose that everything in his studio had been burned. But, fortunately in this case, he was mistaken. There were a number of prints of the Buffalo Bill film destroyed, which had been made by the Powers Company upon order from the Buffalo Bill and Pawnee Bill Film Company, but the negative had been returned to the Buffalo Bill people and was in their down-town office at the time of the fire in the Powers plant.

The statement that these negatives were burned has occasioned some apprehension on the part of those who had contracted for State rights, and the Buffalo Bill and Pawnee Bill Film Company has requested us to assure those who have placed their orders that the negative is perfectly safe, and also that a number of new prints from the same are ready for delivery at any time in the shipping department of the Sales Company, 111 East 14th Street, New York City.

CLARE MERSEREAU.

One of the choicest and most recent additions to the Nestor Stock Company is Miss Clare Mersereau, who, though scarcely more than a child, has already won unlimited theatrical and motion picture honors. Her greatest successes have been as Toto in "Zaza," Lottie in "The Little Princess," and playing juveniles in Maxine Elliott's productions, with whom she has toured two continents.

Like her elder sister, Violet, who plays "leads" in the Nestor Western Stock Company, Miss Mersereau was virtually born on the stage, her mother having been a prominent grand opera singer. She is exceedingly pretty and has a most winsome personality.

Meeting of Exhibitors' Association of Chicago.

A meeting of the moving picture exhibitors of Chicago was called at the Great Northern Hotel, June 19th, at 1 p. m. Invitations had been sent broadcast to theater owners, film renters, manufacturers and the press. A great number of film men responded to the invitation, and the assembly hall was crowded to capacity with representatives of the various interests in the moving picture trade.

Among those present were Messrs. George Kleine, William N. Selig, Maurice Fleckles, John Rock, Fred Aiken, I. Van Ronkel, W. R. Scates, E. E. Fulton, Joseph Hopp, S. Hutchinson.

After a palatable "Dutch lunch" was served and enjoyed by all present, the meeting was opened by the president, George Henry, Grand Theater. The toastmaster was Christopher C. Whelan, Washington Theater; sergeant-at-arms, Isidore Golden; recording secretary, J. Bell, of the Bell Theater.

The assembly was informed that 208 exhibitors had joined the association, and every exhibitor not on the roll was requested to enlist. Many exhibitors did so immediately and 38 new members joined during the course of the meeting. The toastmaster expressed the pleasure of the exhibitors in seeing so many representatives of the trade present, and the desire of the exhibitors to hear from these gentlemen, with their views on the past, present and future of the moving picture. Mr. George Kleine was first requested to speak, and among other things said:

"Speaking about the past, I entered the moving picture business in 1896, and in the years from 1896 to 1911 I have had many varied experiences, some of them rather harsh, but most of them very agreeable. Most pleasant has been the social element in the business. From the beginning, there has always been an aggregation of men, exhibitors, exchangemen, and manufacturers, who have been socially extremely kind, even though I found myself on one side of the fence and others on the other side." Mr. Kleine compared the triumvirate of manufacturer, exchangeman and exhibitor to the trinity of "Faith, Hope and Charity," saying, "The manufacturers have faith; they always had faith; the exchangemen have hope; and, God knows, the exhibitors have always had charity. * * * The exhibitor must not forget that the manufacturer has always realized the exhibitor's needs. There has never been a time when the exhibitor has had trouble of one kind or another that the manufacturer has not realized what his troubles were. Coming down to the present time, there are troubles and always have been. I assure you that the manufacturers as a body, or individually, have always had the exhibitor's interests at heart, and discussions have often taken place with a view t ofinding out exactly what the exhibitor wants."

Mr. Hopp spoke, in part, as follows:

"* * * Talking of general good through regular organizations of this and kindred kind to combat legislation, it does not apply to Chicago alone, but goes elsewhere. By this alone, you will at least be able to accomplish * * * a hearing. By this you will be able to help the exhibitor who does not live in Chicago. We know that the restrictions on theaters are severe * * * the building ordinances * * * and we are all here for the purpose of helping you, and I say, speaking for myself, I am with you in heart and sentiment."

Mr. Selig, after a brief address, extended a cordial invitation to the exhibitors to visit his plant.

Mr. Van Ronkel said: "I am not a good orator, but a very good judge of Dutch lunches * * * It is very difficult, as we have the different opinons of 150 exhibitors, trying to please 150 different tastes, but any assistance that the General Film Company, or the American branch of it, can give the exhibitor will be extended."

Mr. Scates: "There are four links in the chain in the moving picture business—manufacturer, exchange, exhibitor, and the public. The first two are organized links. The manufacturer and exchange people are organized. It is now up to the exhibitor. I can only say that I spend most of my time trying to satisfy our customers, and anything we can do to help along the good work will be done."

Mr. McQuade: "One of the chief things we require is a better home for the moving picture. It is the child of literature and art, and ought to be housed properly * * *"

Mr. Von Harleman: "We congratulated the exhibitors of Chicago on getting together, and wished them in behalf of the Moving Picture World every success in the future."

Mr. Gilmore: "We wanted to show the exchanges and manufacturers that we were not antagonistic toward them. The exchangemen help us a whole lot sometimes * * * In four weeks we have grown from a membership of 8 to 208. I think this is for the betterment of the business all the way around. It is up to each and every exchangeman to listen to every exhibitor and be fair with him. Among ourselves, we have a lot of evils—the evils of competition, of legislation, and of unjust discrimination against the picture. The reason that the moving picture has suffered so much lately is that there has been no one to represent it."

THE "ROUND-UP."

Mr. Smith, of the Illinois circuit of theaters, said: "The presence of the manufacturers and exchangemen shows that they are, at least, with us in spirit."

Mr. Alcock, of the Edna Theater: "I am going to ask two questions—why exhibitors should go to another place for their posters, and why they should go to another place for their song slides."

Mr. Kleine: "My only answer is by declaring my own sentiments. These questions of song slides and posters are a source of trouble to both exhibitor and manufacturer as well as the exchange. In the handling of the poster, as far as the manufacturer is concerned, there is nothing but loss, but it is a necessary adjunct to the exhibitor and ought to be classed with rent and labor and other necessary things of that sort."

Mr. Sam Schiller: "* * * Song slides have nothing to do with the film, but posters ought to be given out with the film."

Mr. Aiken: "Our poster department, while possibly not a loss, is not a money-maker."

After this followed considerable discussion on the question of the poster service separate from the film service. In general, the exhibitors expressed dissatisfaction, and cited such examples as when a reel for which a man is booked is out of town, and is delayed so that he cannot have it—it would be too late for him to go to the poster service and get the poster for the reel he gets instead. Result—he must do without a poster, or show a poster for a film which he is not running. It was moved that this matter be put to a standing vote, but the motion was called out of order.

The harmony of the meeting was endangered when two rival champions for Licensed and Independents mixed words. Mr. Bell, of the Bell Theater, who takes Licensed service, burst out in quite an enthusiastic speech, for the General Film Co. This did not quite respond to Mr. Natkin, of the Ideal Theater, which is an Independent house. Mr. Nielsen, of the Kimble Theater, calmed the disturbance, and spoke to the associations, earnestly urging the exhibitors to work in harmony and discard any personal element.

The meeting was closed with a flash-light photograph taken by the staff of the Moving Picture World.

G. F. Von Harleman.

The Italian government recently called for tenders for the filming of naval tournaments, sailors' exercises, launching of vessels, etc., granting the sole right to take pictures to the firm which would pay a sum down, give a guarantee to accept all the engagements fixed by the Administration. It is not yet announced whose was the successful tender, but the singularity of the competition was that makers were obliged to return their tender before five o'clock of the same day upon which they received the contract form.

At the Chicago Orpheum.

This has been a grand week at the Orpheum and it, each week, they cannot have one as fine a program, the managers would be able to raise the admission price and give to the vaudeville managers their word for it.

"Uncle Ardent," at the Biograph.

"Indianapolis Auto Races," at Lexnay.

"The Nurses" of Selig.

"Travel" to Pathe.

"Van Bibber's Experiment," of Edison, and other features.

No theatrical manager can bring out on any stage, not even at Drury Lane, Covent Garden, Paris Grand Opera, Milan Scala, etc., the true and realistic effects as found in "Uncle Ardent" and "The Nurses." They can show us painted rocks and board boats, canvas waves, but they cannot show us the real ocean and real nature, as in the motion pictures.

This is what pleases. The gods of the gallery, like those below in the auditorium, seem to have a desire to go back to nature. We live in cities, we like city life, yet we crave for a touch of nature. Motion pictures are the nearest thing to satisfy this craving.

"Faust" was great, but the best film of the week, the best production, commanding the greatest praise and which appealed to the public, was "Van Bibber's Experiment." Passing over the excellency of the photographic work and of the clever acting, I wish to call the attention to the story proper. A film without a scandal, without a jealous wife, without a divorce, free from sensation, a film in which the perpetual villain is replaced by a man with a noble heart, a man willing to uplift this fallen world instead of casting his stone at the weaker ones. This story is beautiful; it is a great moral lesson, without the sensational features urged by certain manufacturers, without trying to appeal to the mind by showing degradation. This story shows us plainly that many men are not born criminals, but if forced to steal, it is because the necessity forces them to do so. It shows us that a fallen man has still a tender spot that can be touched to reform him. This picture should be called "True Charity" and should be shown in all the churches, as the experiment of Van Bibber is a strong moral lesson, a plain-to-the-point sermon. Would it not be far better for our manufacturers, Licensed as well as Independent, to produce pictures showing us the noble acts of which man is capable, instead of always depicting the bad side of life?

The talk of an open market has decided many of our manufacturers to take the hint; they are showing us what can be done and now we can expect wonders from them.

J. M. BRADLET.

Chicago.

The Industrial Moving Picture Company, of this city, have engaged a larger suite of offices on the third floor of the Boyce Building, 30 N. Dearborn Street, which they expect to occupy by the middle of next week.

The foundation has just been completed for a new $50,000 moving picture theater, at 12th Street and Kedzie Avenue, which is being erected by Mr. A. M. Gollos, proprietor of the Jefferson Theater, 55th and Lake Streets. The new theater will have a seating capacity of 1,500 and will undoubtedly be the finest and most splendidly equipped picture house in the city. It will be built in Gothic style and will be complete in every appointment. Mr. Gollos states, that he will adhere to the policy of exclusive pictures with an admission fee of five cents and that he will endeavor to provide the public with the finest program obtainable. Three reels of pictures, illustrated songs and a character singer, will constitute the program, while a full orchestra will furnish the music. Licensed service will probably be used. As a theater owner and manager, Mr. Gollos has been remarkably successful and we trust that fortune will favor him with the success and prosperity which he has been justly awarded in the past.

As a result of Lyman H. Howe's ingenious plan to record on film for historical record, pictures of the "Great" and places of note, The Chicago Historical Society has received its first assignment of history telling motion pictures and have stored them away for future reference. The films have been placed in an airtight case under even temperature where they will remain for at least twenty years, according to the present plans, though with the precautions that have been taken in their preparation, they may be kept for a century and the Chicago of 2011 may view the Chicago of 1911 as though time had been reversed. The pictures are the first to be set aside for this purpose. They show the new Northwestern Railroad Depot, one of the finest and most modern structures in the city, and one that has been built with an intention of durability. Mr. Howe intends to make his collection of pictures one which will be of great value as reliable and durable historical records. And there is not a doubt but that in future years they will prove of great interest and material value to the entire world.

Mr. Chas. J. Verhalen, the Chicago manager of "The Billboard," was married last Wednesday to Miss Lillian C. Bassler, of this city, the ceremony taking place at St. Gregory's Catholic Church. Mr. and Mrs. Verhalen will spend a few weeks honeymoon in Canada, after which they will make their home in Chicago. Mr. Verhalen, with his glad-hand-to-all disposition, has won many friends both in newspaper and theatrical circles, and well may he receive their hearty congratulations and best wishes.

Billings, Montana, is soon to have in operation one of the handsomest theaters in the West, if not in the country, devoted especially to motion pictures.

The theater is practically a duplicate of the Illinois Theater in Chicago, and will have a seating capacity of eighteen hundred.

First-run moving pictures will be exhibited, and the balance of the program will be filled out with soloists and high-class musical numbers. The film service and other supplies are being furnished by the Co-operative Independent Film Company, of Denver, and one of the "Sunlight" Metallic Cloth Curtain Company's fixed screens, size 18 ft. x 24 ft., will be installed.

People of the West have long since demonstrated their confidence in the future of moving pictures. Many of the high-class theaters have been built especially for this purpose. Mr. A. L. Babcock, who is identified with the Yellow Stone National Bank, of Billings, is the moving spirit in this big enterprise, and is manager of the theater.

Among the Chicago Shows.

The Home Theater, on Cottage Grove Avenue near Sixty-Third Street, is a fine example of a pretty theater whose keynote is simplicity. Its front is neat and pretty, without a bit of the usual gingerbread work found in the ordinary theater front. The only expensive thing about the front is the white tile walls, and yet the theater does not suggest in the least any cheapness—rather refinement instead. The program offered by Manager Heather consists of two reels of Licensed pictures, with an illustrated and spot song. The machine used is a kinodrome, which Manager Heather says is one of the first of this make placed on sale. Operator Insley speaks well of this machine, which has been sold only a short time, being only leased up to a few months ago. It certainly does good work in his hands, and the picture on the curtain is very good, steady and bright. Mr. Heather says that his business is very good, considering the hot weather and the nearness of two amusement parks.

The Woodlawn Theater, on Sixty-Third Street near Monroe Avenue, is another house in which the owner is the operator; expected result—good pictures on the screen. Mr. Christian Heinen, the operator-manager, certainly does "deliver the goods" in the shape of a well-projected picture, and the picture on the screen is characterized by brilliancy, depth and brightness. Mr. Heinen claims to be using only 45 amperes of alternating current at the arc, but the light is better than many operators obtain with 60. Two reels of Licensed pictures, with an illustrated song, form the program. One noticeable thing about this show was that the drummer, instead of trying to make all the noise possible, kept quiet most of the time, and allowed the piano-player to do her work without interruption, materially increasing the effect of the picture, instead of spoiling it, as so many drummers do. Certainly Mr. Johnson is entitled to credit for using his brains instead of his muscle on his drums, and the same may be said of Mrs. Prairie, the pianist, whose work is excellent. Business was pretty good here, the simple announcement, "Biograph tonight" being ample to fill the place.

Palace Theater.—Across the street, near Madison Avenue, the Palace Theater was also showing a Biograph. This show, too, enjoys good projection, and Operator George E. Dovey handled his light very well. Manager Harry Nortman says business is good in spite of the hot weather, as nearly everyone says where the projection is worthy of the name.

The Lithuania Theater, at Halsted and Thirty-Second Streets, was opened about two weeks ago as a picture and vaudeville house. Although small, seating about 300, it is very well appointed, with cement floor, well sloped, large lobby, and plenty of exits. The operating room is a model, being constructed of reinforced concrete, rendering the usual sheet iron "fire-proofing" unnecessary. It is reached by two ladders, with counter-balanced steel trap-doors. The equipment consists of a No. 6 Powers machine, with Thomas lamp and lamp-house, a transformer economizer, and an extra rheostat. The picture is rather small for a long throw, but it is fairly well lighted, though the operator does not seem able to maintain his light steady. Kulis Brothers, the owners, do not seem to have stinted in the money they invested in this house, and it will probably pay them in the long run, though they admit they are not yet making any money out of the theater.

Repeaters at Park Ridge, Ill.

It is proper to show that good repeaters can be shown, and this often in preference to some of the recent releases. Mr. and Mrs. Chas. A. Kimmit conduct a music school at Park Ridge, Ill., and as they have at their disposal a fine hall, they decided to show motion pictures twice a week. They called on Mr. J. M. Bradlet and after stating to him their object and the fact that they had, as music pupils, members of the best families, they inquired the cost of equipping their place. Mr. Bradlet managed to get for Mr. Kimmit a good operator, the owner of his own machine and accessories, and by having W. O. Runcie to rent his outfit and act as the operator, Mr. Kimmit was able to open his place on Monday, May 29th at a small cost. The next advice of Mr. Bradlet was to give a refined 10-cent show. Service was obtained from the Morton Film Exchange, of Chicago, a junk exchange so called by certain persons, but a far more respectable exchange than many others. Mr. Russell, of the Morton Film Exchange, offers feature films and does not have room on his shelves for "Shame on Max," "Max in a Dish of Cream Cheese," "Oh, You Skeleton," "The Baby of the Boarding House," and such other punk films. In the lists of the Morton Film Exchange you will find such feature films as: "The Stirring Days of Old Virginia, "In Shenandoah Valley," the two films that made Selig famous, "The Fall of Troy," "Joan of Arc," "Uncle Tom's Cabin," "The Life of Christ," "Grandfather" and hundreds of more well-known films that make a name for their makers.

It is a good thing to have a few honest "Junk Exchanges" to act as a public library and allow us to see, again and again, some of these old productions that pleased us so much, when the manufacturers were striving to improve the work. The regular exchanges have returned these old films and if they happen to have a copy, it is in such condition that it cannot be shown. We need such good, old feature productions because our manufacturers are getting careless, they are going too far. "Shame on Max" should be called "Shame on the makers" or "Shame on the exhibitors" who dare to show such ripped pants to a cultured audience and to young ladies. Shame on the film showing such a film.

It would not do to show such pictures at Mr. Kimmit's place and Mr. Kimmit would blush if he was compelled to use such a show. Mr. Kimmit left the selection of the show to Mr. Bradlet, and the following programs will build a reputation for the Music Hall of Park Ridge:

Monday, May 29.—"Fall of Troy," 2 reels.

Saturday, June 3.—"Grandfather," a master production of Pathe Freres. Two good comedies of Gaumont.

Monday, June 25.—"Joan of Arc," of the Pathe Freres. Three short but good comedies. One reel.

For Saturday, June 10, "In Shenandoah Valley" has been engaged.

The patrons of Mr. Kimmit do not object to these old repeaters, but, on the contrary, seem to enjoy them, and as the place is gaining the reputation of showing only clean feature pictures, the patronage is increasing to such a point as to decide Mr. Kimmit to give three shows per week. A brand new airdome, not a block away, does not worry Mr. Kimmit. The airdome can show all of the new sensational productions, the better element of the neighborhood will patronize the Music Hall.

A very sharp censorship has been introduced into Japan by the Minister for Home Affairs. In the future all films will have to be certified as suitable for public exhibition by the nearest Prefect of Police. This official has orders to forbid all films in which parents or guardians are treated with the slightest disrespect by children, or films in which any rough or coarse actions are shown. The only films which will be allowed to be seen by the youth of the country, will be practically those dealing with science or natural history. It will be interesting to note the bearing of this censorship on ancestor worship, which has existed for so many ages in Japan.

CANADA, ALSO, DENOUNCES CHEAP VAUDEVILLE.

The editor of the Owen Sound "Sun" comments on the all-picture policy of the local opera house as follows:

"Manager Joy, of the Savoy Opera House, has decided to discontinue vaudeville at his playhouse and confine the performances to "photoplays" of the highest type. It will be with a sigh of relief that a very large portion of the public will hear this announcement, for many have become tired of the usual type of vaudeville that reaches Owen Sound. Manager Joy, in speaking to the Sun of the change, said: 'I have found of late that the general run of vaudeville acts have been of doubtful merit. Occasionally an act would be good, but the majority have not been up to the standard. The reason for this is that the great increase in vaudeville houses throughout the country created a shortage in performers. To make up the scarcity any stage-struck pair in the country could get up an act and secure a place on a circuit. As a result of this sudden influx of raw material into the business, the general tone of the acts has lowered. I am going to make the change and will give my patrons the very best that can be procured in the 'photoplay line.'" The "Sun" believes that the change will have the endorsement of the citizens. Mr. Joy has arranged for a series of views featuring travel, current events and high-class comedy, and the new censorship which is being inaugurated by the Provincial Government will assure patrons that nothing of an offensive nature will creep into the film program. Outside of this censorship there has been a noticeable improvement in the subjects chosen and this great invention is bound to take an important place in the education of the public. The disagreeable flicker is being gradually overcome and the past year or two has seen a marked improvement in this respect. The moving picture is a great source of pleasure and profit and they will be more fully appreciated when separated from the usual vaudeville performance."

MOVING PICTURES AND TRUANCY.

One of the latest charges laid to the tempting attractiveness of moving pictures is that it causes truancy. With commendable wisdom officials of the National League of Compulsory Education, in convention assembled, declared itself as believing this a just reason for advocating the introduction of the moving picture in the public schools. Years ago truancy and mischief were synonymous, bringing punishment to the young culprits. If the moving picture has made truancy the excuse for an act which is not itself meritorious (the fault lying in the method pursued), who can tell but the young delinquents have unwittingly helped forward a cause which profounder minds have balked at. There are times when good may come from evil, as there are also occasions when the spread of the disease hastens the remedy; who can tell but perhaps this is one of them.

The hunger of the demand for educational advancement is everywhere apparent among the young, and, while those interested in the school room have advocated the aid of illustrative pictures as a means of promoting and facilitating their ideas in quicker and more thorough education, it is certainly a little novel to have the very delinquency of the modern schoolboy added to the causes pressing for the early adoption of this accelerator of young minds. Is it also to be recorded that among its other beneficient effects the moving picture is to cause the otherwise recalcitrant youngster to run to school, instead of running away from school; surely in all these experiences the possibility of arriving at a true solution will shortly be within the reach of all educational authorities.

WASHINGTON RELICS—(Pathe).

Patriotic America is again indebted to Pathe Freres for an Independence Day reel of unusual interest. There are millions throughout this broad land who, while they revere the name of Washington, never have had and never will have the opportunity of seeing the many points of interest that are sacred to his memory. Here is where the Pathe director had a brilliant idea and one which he has carried out with no small degree of intellectuality and painstaking research.

Starting with a panoramic view of Washington's birthplace and its surroundings, we are shown in rapid succession most of the important places associated with his career and views of the tomb at Mount Vernon. We are also shown excellent views of priceless relics now reposing in the archives at the Capital City for the making of which special permission had to be obtained from government officials. The film includes a view of the house of Betsy Ross and of a replica of the original flag of the thirteen state. It closes with a view of the National flag waving in the breeze and a reproduction of one of the most popular airs of Washington. Needless to say, the photography is flawless and as a scenic film, without its great historic interest, it would have merit.

By Richard V. Spencer, Los Angeles.

The Bison Company for the past few weeks have been at work in the Santa Monica and Topanga canyons, putting on a series of exclusive Indian pictures. Most of the stories produced on this trip were of all-Indian casts of character, no cowboy or other Western drama being produced. Nine scenarios were filmed in three weeks under the direction of Mr. Frank E. Montgomery. The company returned to the Los Angeles studio June 10th, and the following Monday began work on a series of Cowboy and other Western pictures. Mr. Fred J. Balshofer, general manager and chief director of the Bison Company, is expected back at Los Angeles about the last of June, after which, it is understood, the Bison studio will be greatly enlarged, and the present big company augmented by a number of new players.

The Pathe Company the past week have been at work upon a big Indian-Military production, which Mr. Young Deer, the director, informs the writer will be an exact and thrilling reproduction of the Medicine Bow Massacre, a tragedy well known to American army officers and old frontiersmen who lived in the Indian country at the time. One of the battle scenes was enacted on the hill back of Edendale, and the whole population turned out to watch the "battle."

The Selig management reports that the Northern Company, under the direction of Mr. Hobart Bosworth is experiencing unusually wet weather, which has delayed productions. Several films have already been received from the north. The films are sent to the Los Angeles studio for development, after which they are run through a projection machine, examined, and sent on to Chicago for printing, and the market.

Fred Huntley, a member of the Selig Stock Company, has been appointed stage manager of the local studio by Mr. Boggs. Mr. Huntley began his new duties June 5th. He will have charge of the interior scene settings, costuming, arranging of scene plots and other routine business of the studio.

Sydney Ayres, well known in legitimate theatrical circles, who has lately concluded an engagement with the Burbank Stock Company as leading man, has joined the Selig Stock Company, to play a special engagement as leading man in a series of forthcoming big productions about to be put on by Mr. Boggs.

Miss Iva Shepard, leading lady in Selig Stock, who some time ago was the victim of a distressing accident while working in an interior scene at the studio, is recovering rapidly from the effects of the injury and will soon return to her work before the camera.

A broncho busting contest was held at the opening of Luna Park, Washington and Main streets, June 9th and 10th, in which participated many of the cowboy moving picture actors employed at the local moving picture studios. Among the crack brancho busters who tested their skill against the wild bronchos were: Hart Hoxie, Jesse Snow, J. W. Nevius, Archie Moore, George Sword, George Chapman, Joe Moonlight and Joe Moore. They tried to subdue the following sun-fishing, sidewinding broncies: "Black Demon," the horse that killed the famous broncho buster Dick Stanley; "Old Cyclone," "Grave Digger," "Snuffy," and "Highball," heroes of a hundred bucking battles. The following contest was taken by the Bison camera, but it is not known whether any of the local companies have made arrangements to photograph this contest.

The writer is informed by the Selig management that the recent big fire picture secured of the burning Byrne Building, a $250,000 local fire, portions of which will be used in the production of dramatic pictures with fire scenes, and that the major part of the conflagration film will soon be released by the Selig Company as an educational release. The fire picture of the burning structure was recently shown to the Los Angeles fire commissioners, fire chief, and other city officials at a private exhibition. The officials were warm in their praise of the pictures, and gratified at the splendid showing made by the Los Angeles Fire Department. The Selig fire pictures are being enthusiastically praised by local picture exhibitors and the general public.

The newest local producers, The Co-operative Film Company, is now engaged in making its pre-release reels. Work at the studio is being rushed to complete the dark rooms and install the necessary apparatus to develop and print the films. The company is using the new Peter's non-infringing camera and Eastman raw stock. Early in June the company journeyed out to Floral Park in the foothills and took a number of scenes of their first picture, a Western, entitled: "Mercy Rewarded." 25 people worked in the picture, including several children. The writer was privileged to examine the negatives of several scenes. The photography is clear and distinct in the scenes examined. Several well-known local actors are memberse of the Co-operative Stock Company, and with competent dramatic direction, the company has every facility to turn out excellent work. D. S. Marcowitz, president of the company, and local manager of the California Film Exchange, is optimistic regarding the future of the company, and says that they will specialize on Western films.

Miss Margaret Ward Manners, who has lately been playing important parts in Pathe West Coast Stock, has left the Pathe Company and will henceforth be seen in the productions of the California Motion Picture Mfg. Company, of Long Beach, Cal., with whom she has igned a contract.

The California Motion Picture Mfg. Company, a Long Beach corporation, for the past two weeks have been engaged on pictures, four having been produced at the Long Beach studio. The company have taken a number of exterior scenes in Long Beach and vicinity. Many Long Beach people have taken city blocks of stock in the corporation, and the population of the seaside city is very much interested in "watching the wheels go around" when exterior scenes are taken. Up to a recent date the company occupied offices in Los Angeles at 601 Delta Bldg., but recerently have removed their office to Long Beach, which from this date forward will be the headquarters of the business offices and studio. The company plans to make 20 pre-release reels, after which arrangements to market will be made. The studio is under the general management and direction of M. F. Brooks, an official of the corporation, and a photographer of many years' experience. The equipment of the studio is now completely installed and ready to turn out enough film to supply any reasonable demand. The dramatic director and the members of the stock company have been chosen. They are staging two reels per week.

The case of the Motion Picture Patents Company vs. Fred Siegert, which was to have come before the Los Angeles Federal Circuit Court June 12th, has again been postponed by Judge Wellborn because the plaintiff's attorneys asked a continuance. Local moving picture producers are watching the outcome of the case with interest. Mr. Siegert s said to have been cited for contempt of court for refusing to comply with a court order demanding that he surrender an alleged Pathe moving picture camera to the United States Marshal for destruction, together with some five or six negatives which the attorneys for the Motion Picture Patents Company allege that he still retains, and which they claim were produced with the said camera at Siegert's West Jefferson Street studio. The case has been set forward one week and is scheduled to come up again June 19th.

NOTES OF INTEREST.

The City officials of Chambersburg, Pa., are making arrangements for the establishment of a free moving picture show which will consist of three reels of film each night at Red Bidge Park. A large booth and screen has been installed. The pictures can be observed from any seat.

The State Superintendent of Public Instruction, Mr. J. D. Eggleston, of Richmond, Va., is another firm believer of public schools installing moving pictures of an educational nature which will teach the pupils both history and Geography.

Mr. Lem. Smith, secretary of the Park Board of Denver, Colo., has placed moving pictures in the city parks.

The proprietors of moving picture theaters in Austin, Tex., who formerly charged ten cents admission, have reduced it to five cents.

The finance committee of the park commission of Atlanta, Ga., has inaugurated a free moving picture show at Grant Park. The exhibition will be given every night. Seats have been arranged as they are in air domes.

"On the Brink" (Rex.)

It's fun to write about a good film. There is nothing that we like better than to come out flat-footed, when a man has made a pretty moving picture, and tell him so. We wish conditions were such that we could give an unqualified boost to every moving picture that is being made. Some day we hope that such a thing will be possible, but this time is not yet.

"On the Brink" is a beautiful picture, beautiful because it is simple. We were not particularly attracted by the title: first, because it means nothing, and secondly, because it is not original. But after all that does not make a very great amount of difference, for, as our old friend Bill Shakespeare says, "The play's the thing." There is a certain ragged fascination about the joys and sorrows of plain fisher folks. Their joys are so simple and gay, and their sorrows are so profoundly deep, that they both assume a certain dignity, and one cannot help giving them attention whenever they appear, whether it be in book form or moving pictures. All of us remember the good "Mr. Peggoty" of David Copperfield; his heart was light and as simple as that of a child, and yet his sorrows sank down deeper into his heart than any one would ever suppose that human emotion could go.

In this little Rex picture, "On the Brink," we are given a glimpse of the simple but powerful love of a fisher lass. Mr. Porter, the Rex producer, has preserved the correct atmosphere of a fishing village in a manner that stamps him as a true artist. None of the points have escaped his eye. The details are beyond criticism, and, of course, have a great deal to do with the charm of the story. The key-note of this pretty picture is human nature in the rough. In the part of Tess, the bare-footed fisher girl, Miss Lois Weber is at her best. Philip Smalley, with his stalwart figure, as the handsome though heart-free young fisherman is absolutely great, in a burly, honest sort of a way. But when it comes to acting, Mr. Charles DeForest had it on them both forty ways. Of course his work differs from their's because they play leads, and he generally plays character comedy parts. But in this particular picture his work as the half-witted brother of Tess is one of the finest bits of character pantomime work that we have ever seen. He has simulated to the finest degree, all of the nervous muscular movements that are common to simple-minded or half-witted persons. He seems to know all of the little nervous twitchings and involuntary muscular movements of a cheerful idiot. The difficulty in playing a part like that is to play it in such a way that it will not be repulsive. After seeing this picture we have an idea that we would like to see much more of Mr. DeForest in strong character roles.

The story of "On the Brink" is something about a fisher girl who is in love with a rugged but handsome young fisherman who is entirely unconscious of her love. One day a party of city folks come to the village and engaged him to show them around the fisheries. Among the visitors was a handsome young lady. The fisher girl conceived an idea that this young city girl might steal away the possible affections of the man she secretly loves, although, of course, such a thing was entirely improbable. Nevertheless she follows them wherever they go, and by this means Mr. Porter, the Rex producer, has taken opportunity to show us some very delightful scenes in a fishing village, and some very pretty stretches of sea beach and fishing activities.

The girl follows the party for some time until they arrive at an ice-house into which they peer for a few moments, and then pass on their way. The ice-house door is left open for a few minutes and the guide of the party, the young man whom Tess loves, returns to close it. As she happens to be hiding behind the door, her only refuge is inside of the ice-house. The door is locked by her hero who immediately passes on his way, leaving her inside of the ice-house to be nearly frozen to death. The balance of the reel shows the efforts of her half-witted brother to release her from her dangerous predicament. He finally succeeds, but only with the assistance of the very man who locked the door in the first place. Mr. Porter has a very delightful way of suggesting in about one second's time, the whole beginning and ending of a love affair. With him the happy ending lasts about a second, and we are told as much in that second as most other producers tell in a hundred feet of film.

The interior scenes of the ice house were taken at the Rex studio in New York City. The writer happened to be present at the time the interior scenes were being taken. It was on a very hot summer's day, and in order to get the proper atmosphere for the picture, several tons of ice were brought up on the studio floor and placed in position, making the entire place so delightfully cool that the writer lingered there all afternoon. Perhaps that is the reason why the interior scenes are not quite so good as the outdoor ones. Later, on looking at the picture on the screen, some one made a remark about "phony" ice, or something to the effect that the ice was not as well painted as it might have been, which goes to show that sometimes a man in criticising a moving picture is not exactly sure what he is talking about.

The photography in this picture is not to be excelled by the Rex Company or any other that we know of. They have a certain standard that they always live up to, and hereafter, in describing the photography and scenic effects of Rex pictures, we are thinking of having a rubber stamp made to save us the trouble of extolling each time their virtues.

Humorous Incidents at the Powers Fire.

At the recent fire of the Powers Moving Picture Company's factory in New York City, there were many humorous incidents that took place in the excitement of the moment, which if set forth may be of service at some time or other if there are any more fires in moving picture factories. There were about 200 employees in the factory at the time the fire started, and the things that some of them did are worthy of mention.

A fire will bring out the cool headedness of some persons, while with others it will show their hysterical nature. The Powers camera-man, for instance, Mr. Al. Leach, when he heard that there was a fire and saw his companions running to and fro, immediately ran across the street from the factory and trained his camera upon the building, and got a moving picture of the frightened persons as they ran from it. While he was doing this there were others on the inside doing foolish things. Two or three of them grabbed an old "prop" piano, worth nothing as a musical instrument, being entirely devoid of strings or any musical value. These men were trying to move it out of the place, supposing that they were saving something valuable, but all the good they did was to get the heavy case jammed in the doorway so that nothing else could be saved. One man came running down the stairs with a couple of rewinders in his hand, followed by another employee bearing a couple of empty reels. One of the girls in the upstairs office, seeing a sweater that was left behind by one of the stenographers, seized it and put it on, taking time to draw it over her head, when she might better have been employed in saving books, some of which were burned.

It is quite certain that had Mr. Tom Evans, the general manager of the plant, not been present when the fire broke out, very many of the valuable negatives would have been lost. Mr. Evans was quick to seize the valuable things that could be saved. There being no time to crank up the large omnibus automobile, Mr. Evans gave orders to those about him to shove it out of doors by hand, which was immediately done. He then gave orders to carry out the negatives which were in the large vault close by the entrance, and by his presence of mind and quick action he saved many other valuable things which no doubt would have been left behind.

When the camera operator had finished with his first load of film, he went somewhere else and found another load and kept his camera playing upon the fire as the firemen were at work. All the while he was working, Mr. F. A. Powers, the owner of the plant, stood by his side making the best of what seemed to be a very bad deal. There were some humorous situations and incidents at the fire, and Mr. Powers would occasionally call the attention of the camera man to something ludicrous, which he thought would look well in a film, and the same was immediately recorded by the faithful camera man.

A fire drill in all fire factories would not be at all a bad thing, and not only a fire drill for a fault in department as well, teaching the employees what they have to do in case of fire. Girls in the offices should be taught that a ledger or a cash book is of much more importance than a bunch of love letters or some other trivial thing. These things should be known in advance and if they were are as valuable and as important as insurance. Some fire factors, him to the thing to be said, whether it is active or not. The only thing that workmen should attempt to carry out with them in case of fire is film, all the film they can carry to safety, especially negatives. In the offices save the books.

From Denmark comes the report of the construction of an apparatus which will enable motion pictures to be transmitted to any desired distance. According to a recent account, the invention is fundamentally based on the Kerr system, but modified in such a manner that the separate pictures are received sufficiently quickly to obtain continuity of vision. Some one and a half years ago a Frenchman of the name of Armengard produced an invention something on these lines. His apparatus was, however, so slow as to be useless for the purpose of cinematography.

Miller Brothers' 101 Ranch.

Mr. Bartlett, who is managing the moving picture department of the Miller Bros. 101 Ranch, comes up from Bradley Beach to see us by request. He says that the only pictures of the Wild West are those that are taken on the ranch of patriotic young ones. Western pictures portraying life on the range with the cowboy and Indian for a companion, we shall not be satisfied that at last the public can have what they desire—real Western pictures, without all that studio lure and attendant affectation. An artistic success.

Each part of the 101 Ranch pictures portrays a different phase of the daily routine of the ranch dweller, and one almost feels as though he is living the range with the cowboys. In the picture in which is depicted about two hundred feet of film, showing the method of rounding up all the cattle to inspect the brands, to pick out the cattle of neighboring ranches, and also to brand all the young head before putting them on the feed for the winter.

Many time is pictured, with the chuck wagon driven into camp and all the riders gathered around and helping themselves and then calling on to their positions. In these four reels are pictured scenes that have never before been shown on the moving picture screen, and too numerous to mention. Two particularly good scenes which interested everybody present were a buffalo hunt and a genuine stampede of cattle. In the buffalo hunt, which was purposely staged, we got a first class idea of the way this animal is hunted, and saw one head actually killed in the chase. The stampede, which was taken only by chance, shows the frightened herd running blindly across the plains, trampling to death those unfortunate enough to fall in the path of the herd. What caused this stampede is not known, but as luck would have it, one of the Miller Brothers' cameramen happened to be on the ground when these thousands of fright-crazed cattle came thundering on.

The Miller Bros.' ranch is located at Bliss, Oklahoma, and they superintend all the picture-taking and finishing themselves, which is accomplished in a modern and up-to-date factory and laboratory.

New Pathe Pictures.

There is a very interesting and acceptable educational film about to be released by the Pathe people. It is a good picture-lecture on bird life and is finely colored. The views of the different birds, usually the mother bird with the fledglings, are taken close-up, among the grasses or the boughs. The birds shown include the thrush, blackbird, linnet, finch, wagtail, hedge sparrow, pheasant, swan, etc. It is just the picture for teaching school children.

Pathe also has two strong Western stories ready. One of these, "Waiting," begins with a love story in the East. The hero (Henry Walthall) goes West and makes his fortune. On her way out to him, his fiancé's train is wrecked, and then the hero goes insane. Mr. Walthall acts this part convincingly, and very excellent photography brings out even those slight differences in facial expression which are so significant in any portrayal of emotion. The first scene gives a very pretty sentimental picture of the two lovers, and this picture is shown again as the last flash of reason in the mind of the dying lover, many years later; then he is released from his sorrow and the wraith of the little sweetheart comes to kiss him.

The other Western is called "An Indian's Pride." It is perhaps a stronger story even than "Waiting." The backgrounds in it are very beautiful and afford one or two exquisite scenes. The trapper of the story believes that a friendly Indian has committed a theft and, with his friends, he drives him and his family away, burning their tepees. The trapper's children are in danger of being drowned in a swift and treacherous but beautiful mountain torrent. The Indian saves the children and after a hand-to-hand fight with the real thief proves his innocence, but is now too proud to take the trapper's offered hand, for the trapper has called him a thief.

The acting in this picture is, on the whole, very good, particularly that of the Indian, the chief of the robbers, and the settler; the settler's friends are also good as pictures of types. The photography is, of course, excellent. The two scenes most notable for pictorial beauty are that in which the Indian with his squaw and papoose has climed the hill and, looking back, sees the smoke rising from the tepees that had been their home; and that in which the canoe with the children in it swings out on a pool of the stream, just before the Indian swims toward them.

The Pathe Company has also an amusing comedy called "A Bald Lie." The lie is told by a bald man to his wife to account for his coming home very late.

The Battle Hymn of the Republic.

Another splendid film in full accord with the "higher ideals." It embodies many of the requisites of success. The subject is part of our patriotic gospel and there is no man, woman or child whose heart has not vibrated in response to this glorious war-song, which has aptly been called the "Marseillaise" of the North. This is an important advantage at the start. The Vitagraph Company have brought the proper spirit and art to the accomplishment of the task, and no American audience can fail to enthuse over the film. Much of the story is told in the lecture, which is printed elsewhere in this issue of the Moving Picture World. Suffice it to add, that the settings of the allegorical parts have been arranged with consummate skill and give a meaning to the words of the hymn which will delight and impress every audience.

Every scene of the allegorical portion has been thought out with fine judgment and inspiration. So uniform is the degree of excellence here that it would be impossible to pick out one scene especially for fear of belittling the rest. The strange story of the origin of the hymn is told with convincing power and will come as a profound surprise to most audiences. The parts in which Lincoln figures and, again, the scenes in the Northern home, into which the hymn carries its irresistible call to arms, equal in strength of portrayal the allegorical pictures, which is a high tribute. With all the great companies fairly vieing with each other to furnish the exhibitor with products that will add both to his revenues and the prestige of his house, with the Moving Picture World gladly aiding through the furnishing of suggestions and lectures for such films, it seems as if the exhibitor should be able not only to weather out the dullness of the hot season but to put an extra penny in the bank.

Four Vitagraph Reels.

There will be four Vitagraph releases each and every week, beginning this week. The following subjects show sustained quality. On Wednesday, June 28th, a Vitagraph Western Portrayal, "Courage of Sorts"; June 30th, a marvelous patriotic picture, "The Battle Hymn of the Republic," especially produced for the Fourth of July, and surpassing in its display and significance anything of like character that has ever been shown; it meets the safe and sane idea of a real patriotic celebration that will arouse more enthusiasm and more real patriotism than any amount of pyrotechnic flash or booming of cannons. The third special feature is "Tested by the Flag," released on Saturday, July 1st. This is a war drama surrounding a romantic love story of a girl who loves the man who loves his Nation's flag and his country. It is issued as a supplemental offering for the day we celebrate, and all other occasions.

Three comedies and one comedy-drama will be released by the Vitagraph Company within the coming fourteen days. There is a thirst for good, clean-cut comedy, and the Vitagraph will try to satisfy it; not only within the next two weeks but at all future times it will make its comedy releases more numerous, to entertain as well as edify.

The Western Vitagraph players will soon pitch their tents on the Western plains amid the sagebrush and the foothills of the Indian country.

The O'Kalems Combine Business With Pleasure.

We are in receipt of a very attractive concert program issued on board the R. M. S. Baltic while on its way to England in which three members of the Kalem Irish Stock Company have prominent parts. Mr. Arthur Donaldson is down for a song. Mr. Robert Vignola, the well known character man with the company, gave a selected reading, and Miss Agnes Mapes, a recitation. We learn that the concert was very enjoyable and the three numbers rendered by the O'Kalems were highly appreciated. The company arrived safely on the "ould sod" Saturday, June 10th, and are now quartered at Beaufort, in the County Kerry, Ireland, where a permanent studio has been erected. We learn that on the trip over the O'Kalems could not forget work and to keep up their reputation produced a very laughable comedy. In this picture they were aided and abetted by several of the officers of the steamer and a number of the passengers.

NEW EQUIPMENT FOR "THE LYRIC" AT OYSTER BAY.

A new model Motiograph moving picture machine with Hallberg economizer has just been installed at the Lyric Theater, Oyster Bay, L. I., and the patrons express themselves as being very well pleased with the beautiful light and pictures.

Auto Bus for Imps.

A six-cylinder Maxwell automobile has been provided for the use of the stock companies of the Imp Company in the way of taking exterior pictures. The car is roomy, with an omnibus body capable of carrying ten or twelve people and the needed accessories for out-of-door work, which will greatly facilitate matters. The Imp actors are now employed almost exclusively in the way of filming exterior stories, utilizing the favorable weather. A natty little runabout has been purchased for city work in the way of making quick trips from the factory on 101st Street to the studio at 56th Street.

"In the Sultan's Garden," the Imp release of July 3rd, is the first effort of Mr. W. H. Clifford, the new director, in connection with the Imp concern. It is a noteworthy film, something out of the ordinary, and is sure to please. The scenes on shipboard and in the harem are correctly staged and beautiful. There is plenty of excitement in the marine fight, in which the American jackies win and the fate of the beautiful inmate of the harem, who is loved by the handsome young naval lieutenant, will be watched with interest. To appease the wrath of the sultan, she is sewed up in a gunny sack and cast into the sea to make food for the fishes. The plan miscarries and she is rescued by her lover and his men and taken away in a war ship. It is a thrilling story, graphically told.

We understand that Mr. Frank Crane is severing his connection with the Thanhouser forces on July 1st. Mr. Crane has made an enviable reputation in leading roles in the Thanhouser pictures and has been with this company since they entered the field a year and a half ago.

The "Standard" Moving Picture Machine.

Among the many wonderful changes in the moving picture field during the past two years—the ups and downs, and comings and goings—the ever increasing prestige of the "Standard" machine, and the rapid rise of its manufacturers, is a splendid example of modern efficiency applied to projecting machines.

Two years ago, the American Moving Picture Machine Company was but seldom heard of. Today it is practically unable to fill its orders and bids fair to become one of the strongest organizations in the business. The "Standard" machines can now be found in many of the very best houses throughout the country, and especially so in New York City, where competition is keen.

The "Standard" is manufactured in one of the finest equipped modern machine shops to be found in this line, but, notwithstanding all preparations to meet a large demand, the makers now find themselves cramped for space, and we believe will at a very early date be forced to move to larger quarters.

The rapid growth of the "Standard" is not entirely due to control of any pre-eminent feature. Projecting machines were close to perfection when "Standards" were first introduced. The first two years brought no startling improvements in mechanism. The most important along these lines were in simplifying the construction, in lessening trouble and materially reducing the cost of up-keep. However, their model known as No. 4 is something entirely out of the ordinary, and they have not only made wonderful changes in the mechanism and stand, but also have a new lamp and lamphouse that will prove a blessing to operators.

For two years their experts have been giving their undivided attention to creating a trouble-proof machine. Doing away with the many delicate parts so common to projecting machines and making a few strong and durable parts do the work more satisfactorily. In so doing, they have designed a machine which has proved itself a masterpiece of mechanism.

Another strong feature in connection with this concern is the type of mechanics they employ. Their factory superintendent is a man of advanced ideas; a graduate of German technology, who is in every respect qualified to cope with the many vexatious problems that arise from time to time. Trained from boyhood in the very best houses in Germany, England and America, this man has come to know materials and can demand the best.

Every part of a "Standard" mechanism is machined and drilled on their own premises. Every tiny part is subjected to a more rigid examination than they will ever succeed in actual usage. Every head is mounted on a pedestal and driven by motor for hours at a time before it is sent out. In this manner any factory error is found and corrected before the machine is sent out.

One of the first and best steps the American Moving Picture Machine Company made was to equip their plant so that every part could be built in their own factory better and cheaper than anywhere else. They installed thousands of dollars worth of automatic machines, each of which has its own particular work, cutting parts of the exactness of a thousandth part of an inch, and which makes all parts interchangeable. They would not entrust their reputation to others to do. Their foremen must watch every process, and inspect all material, and consequently suffer if a mistake is made.

Last but not least is the courteous treatment received by all. Whether you are an admirer of a "Standard" or any other machine, you are always sure of a hearty welcome at their office. The letter files are overflowing with testimonials and to give our readers some idea of the high esteem in which the management of this concern is held by exhibitors, we quote below a portion of a letter written them by Mr. D. S. Haynes of Evansville, Ind., which the writer of this article has personally seen.

"Gentlemen: All my dealings with your concern have been so perfectly satisfactory and you have always shown such a willingness to do the right thing, that if you told me you were manufacturing a diamond with a machine I certainly would expect to find it when the case was opened.

"Yours, Very sincerely,

"(Signed) D. S. HAYNES."

But notwithstanding the success that has attended these people by reason of their fair and honest dealings, it is trifling compared to what has been attained through the efficiency of the "Standard" machine.

The Home of the "Hallberg" Economizer.

In order that his many out of town friends and customers may obtain a good idea of his new quarters, No. 36 East Twenty-third Street, New York, Mr. Hallberg has furnished the Moving Picture World with the accompanying illustration, showing his private office, main office and exhibition room, testing and demonstrating room, and the shipping and stock room. Cut No. 1 shows Mr. Hallberg's private office. Cut No. 2 illustrates the main office and sales room, where are displayed all standard makes of motion picture machines, the various sizes of "Hallberg" economizers; rheostats, ticket choppers, exhaust and ventilating fans, opera chairs, announcement slides, spot lights, flame arc lamps, etc. Mr. Hallberg carries in stock the most complete assortment of high-grade M. P. and sereopticon lenses in New York City, as well as repair parts for all M. P. machines. The cut also shows the various electrical apparatus connected to both alternating and direct current circuits, ready for demonstration.

Cut No. 3 illustrates the demonstration and testing room with miniature screen, enabling Mr. Hallberg to give a graphic exhibition of the operation of all makes of motion picture machines, with and witout the "Hallberg" economizer attached; also to show the difference in quality of light by using the rheostat or the "Hallberg" economizer, and by attaching a watt meter, volt meter and ammeter, demonstrate the current saving. Mr. Hallberg has also in this room other makes of current savers, and is prepared to demonstrate all his claims for the Economizer in comparison with them. His complete equipment of all electrical measuring instruments enables him to convince the most skeptical of the merits of the Economizer. In this room are also tested the lenses for the M. P. machines. Moving picture lenses are matched to the stereopticon lenses by actual process—not by guess-work, insuring a correct fit, so that every machine is shipped with an equipment to meet the special requirements of the exhibitor.

Cut No. 4 shows one of the stock rooms where Mr. Hallberg carries supplies of all kinds used in the moving picture business, enabling him to make prompt shipments.

The offices are completely equipped with the "Hallberg" econimizer and special incandescent lamps, saving two-thirds on the electric bill for general lighting.

Mr. Hallberg extends a cordial invitation to the trade to call on him, and will endeavor to make the visit both interesting and profitable.

NAT WILLS WILL SOON MAKE HIS DEBUT.

On July 15th the Powers Company offer their first release of famous theatrical stars posing exclusively in pictures of their production. The first release will be Nat M. Wills, America's foremost "tramp" comedian, in an elaborate burlesque production entitled "The King of Kazam."

The Wills picture is certain to create an ovation in the picture world. It has been said that an actor appearing for his first time in pictures usually works too much to the camera. In Nat Wills' case, however, there is a happy exception to this rule. His facial expressions are most ludicrous, and he worked with all the skill and technique of an experienced picture actor.

OLD INDIAN DAYS (Pathe).

The Indians in this film are a bit theatrical, but the reel as a whole is very acceptable. The showing of Indian customs, the Indian manner of living, cooking, feasting, traveling, wooing, etc., is very prettily done. The action has that touch of sensationalism, which seems in the film maker's eyes essential to every Indian story. Acting and photography are in the usual satisfactory Pathe style. As a strictly Indian picture, the film will be welcomed by that large share of the public, that is still fascinated by stories of the red man.

Chicago writes: "I confess that at times I am completely discouraged. I try to the best of my ability to play appropriate music for the pictures and succeed fairly—sometimes. I cannot say I am always satisfied with my own work, even with the good pictures which are usually easiest to interpret. Some of the photoplays are so carelessly thrown together as to make a musical setting very difficult, if not impossible.

"I know I have at least ordinary intelligence, a fair education and, I believe, some ability. I take great interest in playing to the pictures. Why shouldn't I? It is my occupation—my bread and butter—and it is just as serious to me as a bank president's work is to him. For this reason I try to do my work right as nearly as I can judge what is right in the small fraction of time one has in which to decide. But sometimes I think 'what's the use—who cares?' Not the manager. His one thought is 'Get their nickels—push 'em in—throw 'em out.' The operator's motto is 'speed 'em up.' And as to the public—you hear much of 'jackass music,' but little is said about the 'jackass audience.' I have visited many picture theaters and observed the observers closely, and the conclusion is forced upon me that the average person considers the picture show a trivial form of entertainment, and not really worthy of serious consideration. This attitude is not confined to the uneducated element by any means, but is just as frequently found among those who pass for people of refinement, intelligence and education. You will find them almost any night in any picture theater of the better neighborhoods. They are out for fun and the moving picture is a joke to them, regardless of its quality or rendition. It is cheap, therefore it must be trashy; ergo to show their superiority they must 'guy the show.' But they are steady patrons at that. Once in a while an exceptionally good picture will 'grip' them, but not often. And this feeling toward the picture is not peculiar to the 'better classes,' either. You will find a sprinkling of it all the way down the line. Of course there are some who give the photoplay the same respectful attention they would to a theatrical entertainment, but the average American audience seems to judge the quality of anything by its price. The picture show is cheap. Who cares what the pianist does? Who cares what the drummer does? He imitates a sheep and 'some ass laughs.' Of course he laughs. That's what he came for; if he didn't laugh at that he would laugh at something else. I know a number of musicians who conscientiously endeavor to fit their pictures with appropriate music, but they get no thanks for it—no praise, no appreciation that is noticeable. The only fellows who seem to receive any audible praise seem to be those who go after the laughs. They play comic songs in classical pictures (the spectators often join in singing these), the drummer injects some fool noise in a serious scene and your 'jackass audience' is delighted. And this sort of thing is not confined to Chicago either. I have seen and heard it in neighboring towns, and friends tell me New York City is no better.

"I feel in a pessimistic mood to-day through reading E. C. Hall's article in the Moving Picture World of June 10th. We have no sound effects where I am playing, so the greater part of his article does not affect me, but he speaks slightingly of music in general and that hits 'where I live.' It is not easy to think of appropriate music for all scenes. It is no joke to try and think of something that 'will fit' while you are playing something else. Often after the show is over and I have a chance to think, something will occur to me which would have bettered the picture. But while we are playing a show, we are not supposed to stop playing. The mental process is a dual one. We must think of what we are doing and search the same time through our memories for something else—often we don't know just what. It is easy to sit comfortably in a theater with nothing to do but find fault. It is easier to break than to make; and it is easier to 'knock' than to try to accomplish."

You are in a pessimistic mood. I don't think Mr. Hall was finding fault with music in general. His shots seem to have been directed chiefly at the "foolish sound effects" so often heard and criticised. I think myself he was a little bit over-critical in some respects. I believe in sound effects when used intelligently, and I think I have had that privilege at times. He expresses my attitude at the tail end of his letter, thus: "If you can produce every sound or every major sound (the italics are mine), etc." Now I think that embodies the whole argument. The major sounds like the major actions are the ones we are to regard. On a stage a whole crowd of people may be walking and conversing, yet the audience is permitted to hear only that which has to do with the play. It is the same with the action; that which helps to tell the story is made prominent; minor matters are kept in the background. As to playing the correct music, we have all sorts of criticisms and instructions. "Give us something lively," says one. "Why don't you play more popular stuff," says another. "Cut out the music," says another. Some critics want music going incessantly. Others think an occasional shading (such as is heard in better class theaters) is sufficient. Who is qualified to lay down any particular law? The musician gets the blame when the spectator is dissatisfied. That's natural; he is the fellow who is doing the mischief. But it is not always the musician's fault. I have more than once heard the "comic song" played all through dramatic pictures, the audience singing along with a gusto which showed that they thoroughly enjoyed it. They applauded themselves heartily at the end of each chorus. I doubt if anybody followed the pictures very closely; they were there for a good time—that seemed to be their way of enjoying themselves. They paid their nickles and came again. That's what the manager wants. Is he going to interfere with their method of enjoyment? Not so you could notice it. I don't know how conditions are in New York, but it seems inconceivable that all music in the picture shows of that city is bad. One would imagine that some place could be found where the music was at least passable. If there is any such it is never mentioned. I agree with the writer of the above letter in one thing. The critic is always abroad when there is fault-finding to be done, but praise for good work is seldom heard. Now if the question was definitely settled as to what constituted correct music for the picture, the player could at least have the approval of his own conscience, but with so many divers opinions how is he going to improve himself when he is never mentioned except in condemnation? It must not be understood that I am taking issue with Mr. Hall. He is undoubtedly reporting things as he sees and hears them, and it is only through criticism that we can learn our faults or hope to better them. But when he casts a doubt on the mental capacity of any class of people without understanding the nature or reason for their work, he is uncharitable to say the least. It might be just as well to investigate a little closer before making suggestions of such sweeping nature.

Old thoughts in new dress may make new pictures, but not new subjects; look out for re-casts of the same subject; a changed name does not change the character of a story, even if a few new features are added. It may not always be possible to get something altogether new in every particular; it is possible, however, to get a difference

How would it be if a certain number of picture makers were to change and mix up their actors and actresses? There is arising a monotony which needs to be broken. An interchange of ideas often proves beneficial, why not an interchange of personalities. Again the pendulum has been swinging too much in tragical direction; recently comedy-scenic and instructive films are being given too long a vacation; may they not return to the screen again.

A. B. L. Gellerman, president of the Independent Western Film Exchange of Portland, who recently opened a branch exchange in Butte and more recently opened a new picture house called the "Class A," has sold the latter to the Montana Amusement Company, of which Frank T. Bailey is president.

With a view to securing positions for operators and others of whose ability and reliability the editor has no personal knowledge, is found to be impracticable. It is, however, the desire of the Moving Picture World, as well as the desire of the editor of this department, to give every possible reasonable aid to men out of a position. It has therefore been determined to offer operators, managers, film photographers, musicians and, in fact, any one connected with the business, the opportunity to set forth their needs in an "AT LIBERTY" column, at the rate of one (1) cent per word per week. Each initial and number counts as a word. This nominal rate is open only to those out of work.

QUESTIONS ON LAST WEEK'S LESSON.

(1) What is a virtual image?
(2) What is a real image?
(3) What essential difference is there between a real and a virtual image?
(4) Is the image in a flat, plain mirror a real or virtual image?
(5) Is the image on a projection screen a real or virtual image?
(6) Why does the image in a plain mirror appear to be as far back of the reflecting surface as the object is in front of it, and what is lateral inversion?
(7) When a beam of light enters a dark room, falling on a mirror it can only be seen by the eye from one point. Why?
(8) It appears as a bright spot. Why?
(9) When the same beam falls on a sheet of white paper it can be seen from any point and is not so bright as the mirror spot. Why?
(10) There is an angle of incidence in the latter case, but no angle of reflection. Why?

Some interesting, peculiar and valuable experiments may be made with two plain mirrors, both by setting them at varying angles and parallel with each other. If we set two plain mirrors, preferably without frames, on a table, as shown in Fig. 18, and lay an object, say a marble, B, as shown, the eye being at A, we shall see four marbles instead of one, the path of both the incident and reflected ray being illustrated.

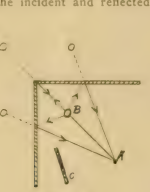

FIG. 18

The marble is reflected by both mirrors directly to our eye, but there is no re-reflection of the image itself. If the angle of the mirrors to each other be made more acute—the surfaces brought closer together—we shall see an increased number of images until, when the surfaces of the glasses are about as shown by detached lines C, there will appear a complete circle of marbles. This is due to the fact that not only is the object itself reflected back to the eye, but its image is also re-reflected many times. The next time you are in a restaurant, or other room where mirrors line both sides of the wall, look carefully and count the number of images of yourself visible on either side. I have viewed as many as a dozen images of myself on either side, in a room of this kind, each one appearing further away, until the images became too dim, through absorption of light by reason of many reflections to be discerned. Strange as it seems, while this phenomonon is always present in a room where mirrors line opposite, parallel walls, it is seldom noted and seldom seen unless one is looking for it, though perfectly plain and exceedingly interesting. In one little restaurant where I dined for a time, in which mirrors lined both walls, I called the attention of a patron who had eaten there daily for more than a year to the phenomonon under discussion and he was astonished, vastly amused and deeply interested. He had looked at those mirrors daily for a year and had not observed it. With our two experimental mirrors we may have some amusement by multiplying one of our housewife's eggs into a dozen before her very eyes. It is indeed possible to make many similar instructive and amusing experiments, but their value will depend upon how much thought is expended in the effort to understand the various phenomena presented. By placing your own face close to the edge of the mirrors when at acute angle, you may see a circle of perfect images of your own countenance. There are many other extremely interesting things in connection with reflection of light, such as multiple images produced by parallel mirrors, multiple images formed in thick mirrors, etc., and I have seriously debated the advisability of going further into the matter of reflection produced by plain mirrors. Space is valuable, however, and it is only my object to lead the operator up to a general knowledge of light action sufficient to enable him to grasp the meaning of things when we arrive at the action of light through lenses. Therefore we will pass on to the consideration of reflection by curved mirrors, which in their action are in some ways very similar to lenses. Let us first consider the concave mirror. Parallel rays falling upon a concave, reflecting surface are reflected, or thrown back in such manner as to converge to a point called the principal focus of the mirror. It must be understood that by "concave mirror" we mean one which has the true curve of a circle at every portion of its surface; in other words, a mirror whose surface is the true segment of a sphere. The principal focus of such a mirror is located at a point very nearly half way between the reflecting surface and the center of curvature of the mirror. The center of curvature is a point distant from the mirror surface by half the diameter of the circle the mirror would form if continued into a complete sphere. This is illustrated in Fig. 19, in which the heavy, black line represents the mirror, the curvature of which is continued in the lighter line forming the complete circle. The center of the circle D is the center of curvature of the mirror. The principal focus is at A. The reason for the principal focus being located at A, half way between the mirror and the center of curvature, is readily understood when we consider the fact that the angle of incidence must equal the angle of reflection. A moment's thought will show that a straight line drawn from the center of curvature to any point on the mirror must and will be normal to the mirror at that point. Very well. Examining Fig. 19 we see that any one of the rays shown, except the two outer ones, when reflected to the point of principal focus have fulfilled that law. In Fig. 19 the dotted lines are normal to the surface of the mirror at the point at which they reach it. Take ray B C, for example: it is reflected to the principal focus as shown by line B A. Dotted line B D reaches from center of curvature to the mirror, to which it is, of course, normal at B. Remember that "normal" means at right angles, or perpendicular to. We will find that angles formed by lines C B, D B and B D, B A to be equal, the first being the angle of incidence and the latter the angle of reflection. The rays will only all be reflected to the point of principal focus where the mirror is of comparatively small size as compared to the half of the whole circle. If too great a section of the arc of the circle is included in its surface the rays near its outer rim will not reach the principal focus, but be focused further back as shown in ray H I. Only a parabolic mirror retains its point of focus when its size includes a whole half sphere. In the foregoing we have briefly set forth the general action of parallel rays and the spherical mirror. With rays eminating from some nearby source of light, however, a totally different problem is presented.

In 1, Fig. 20, we have a point of light, X, projecting rays on a curved mirror, BC, D being its center of curvature, and D E a normal from center of curvature to the mirror surface at E. G H represents the path of a parallel ray to H, the principal focus of the mirror. A moment's study will convince you that the angle of incidence being equal to the angle of reflection, the point of focus for ray X E must be further from the mirror than the point of principal focus, and we find it located at I. The point of focus where, as in the case of ray E G, the source of light is beyond the principal focus is called the conjugate focus. Remember in considering these things that where parallel rays are mentioned they are rays coming from infinite distance, as from the sun. If, however, on the other hand, the source of light A be placed between the point of principal focus and the mirror (2, Fig. 18), the rays of light, in order that the angle of incidence, A D B, and the angle of reflection, D C B, be equal, must diverge from the mirror, instead of converging to a point in front of it as before and we shall therefore have a virtual image behind the mirror, instead of a real image in front of it as before. (There would be a visible, real image at the point of principal focus in the first two experiments, if a cardboard screen be held there to receive it.)

The point at which the image appears to be, behind the mirror, in the last experiment is called the virtual focus. It is a point between the mirror and the point at which the diverging rays would converge, if continued as shown by the dotted lines. Under this condition (illustrated in 2, Fig. 20), we see an enlarged, virtual image. In other words, the object is "magnified," provided the eye be located nearer the mirror than its principal focus. If located at the focus there will be no image at all, though further away it again appears, but inverted and smaller than the object itself. In

2, Fig. 20, B is the center of curvature. D E and E F are normals. Let me again caution the student to, in tracing light action, always consider the ray as traveling from the object TOWARD the eye—never the reverse.

In convex mirrors the image is always diminished in size as compared to the object. The reason is made plain in this illustration rays A B eminate from extremes of the object, being reflected to the eye, located at C, as shown. Result is a virtual image D E, much reduced in size. The size of the image will depend on (a) distance of eye and object from mirror and (b) curvature of mirror. In the attempt to understand such matters proceed as follows: Consider only one point on the object, the extreme tip of the arrow, for instance. This point, like all other points on the object's surface, is sending out rays, by reflection from its surface, in every direction. The angle of incidence always equals the angle of reflection—remember that. Therefore only the rays from that point on the mirror surface which will reflect it to the eye will be sent back to the eye. For instance: The ray striking the surface at F manifestly will be reflected to G. Other rays from the same point of the object are striking the mirror at every portion of its surface, but they are reflected in other directions than to the eye. Only the rays which fulfill the law "the angle of incidence equals the angle of reflection" will reach the eye. In Fig. 21 the dotted lines are normal to the surface of the mirror at D and E, being drawn through center of curvature F.

I believe that while much more might be said concerning reflection of light, sufficient has been set forth to give the reader a reasonably fair idea of the rules and laws governing the same under varying conditions, and this is all that is designed to accomplish in this work. Having, therefore, accomplished our purpose, we will proceed, next week, to the consideration of Refraction of Light.

A Number of Questions.—New York City writes: "Allow me to trouble you about the rather confusing subject of lenses. (1) The lens I use for a 12-foot picture on a 35-foot throw would, of course, project a picture almost twice as large at 80 feet. If I use an extension tube, removing the back combination from the film by a couple of inches, the picture will be considerably smaller. Can I use a tube long enough to make the same size, that is to say a 12-foot picture at 80 feet, or would the picture be out of focus? And will it be too much lost illumination? (2) Which is the easiest way to tell what size picture a lens will throw at a given distance by looking at the lens? (3) How do you figure the size of a lens? By its m. m. or by its back focus? (4) What do you mean by 'a,' 'c' and 'b.' Does this refer to the diameter or just the quality, and how do you tell the size by looking at it? (5) Are the Pink Label or the Bio carbons better for A. C.? (6) Is it good to leave a machine all night in gas-oline, and how do you lubricate the gears to keep the grind out? (7) Which is the easiest way to fit a belt on a take-up in order to give it just the right tension? (8) Is it necessary to wash condensers as alcohol every week, and to clean the lag terminals?" (9) Is there any way to tell whether or not the lamp is grounded without striking the arc and using a test lamp?"

(1) You say, "If I use an extension tube, removing the back combination from the film by a couple of inches," etc. Just what you mean by "extension tube" is not clear. If you mean using a tube built on the extension plan that is to say, a tube in which the combinations of lenses may be spread further apart or brought closer together, I would not recommend you to try to do this on such an extreme case. The result might be unsatisfactory. Moreover the back combination must be a distance from the film equal to the back focus of the two combinations. The lens will not focus at any other point. If you mean to use an ordinary tube and remove the front combination, using only the rear combination, that will probably work all right, but you would not get very good definition. However, in order for me to answer this question intelligently you will have to be a little more specific in your question. (2) You cannot tell what size picture the lens will throw by looking at it. With the Edison lenses you can look at the markings on the lens and then look at the Edison projection table and find approximately what size picture that particular lens will throw at a given distance, but every lens manufacturer has a different mark and, moreover, these marks are not always to be encouraged upon. The best method is to measure your lens as directed on page 60 of the Handbook. You can find the same instructions by looking through the back numbers of the Trouble Department. I would advise you, however, to procure the Handbook by all means. Its price is $1.50 and it will be mailed to you by the "Moving Picture World" on receipt of that sum. (3) The millimeter is simply another method of stating the focal length of the lens. Measure your own lenses, is my advice, and the quicker you learn to do these things the better off you will be. On pages 60, 80, 81, and 105 of the Handbook will be found tables for both stereopticon and moving picture lenses, giving the size picture each one will throw at a given distance. Also, as above stated, on page 67 you are taught how to do your own figuring. Please understand I am not urging you to buy the Handbook in order to make the sale; I am advising you to buy it because it is a thing every operator and manager ought by all means to have. (4) I do not know what you mean by "1, 1½, 1¾." There is a 1¼ size lens, a 1½ size lens and a 1¾ size lens, and a lens of still larger diameter called a "four four," though the latter two are not much used in projection. These expressions refer to the diameters of the lenses. The ordinary moving picture lens is 1¼ size lens; some stereopticon lenses are ¼ size and some are 1½ size, the 1½ size being of larger diameter and much the better lens for stereo work, as it gives better definition with less liability to brown the corners in the picture. I do not at this moment remember the exact diameters of the various sizes. (5) The Pink Label and the Bio carbons are both excellent articles. We cannot make comparisons of merchandise in this department. (6) If the machine is all metal, no possible harm could come to it through sitting over night in gasoline, though I would not advise this if it has a wooden base, since the wood would become thoroughly saturated with gasoline and hence highly inflammable; moreover, it would, for a considerable time, give off gasoline fumes which would be very easily ignited. There is nothing to be gained by leaving the machine over night in gasoline. Some operators clean out the bearings by immersing the machine in gasoline and turning the crank a dozen times or so, immediately removing it. This does not harm and really does accomplish some good, since it washes both the bearings and the gears thoroughly, removing all dirt. The machine should then be thoroughly lubricated, of course. Lubricate the gears with some grease or with automobile or engine cylinder oil. (7) Stretch your belt around the pulleys ordinarily tight and then cut it so it will be possibly ¼ inch short, if it is a fairly long belt. A little judgment is all that is necessary to get your belt right, and the tension will take care of by the friction device. (8) The condensers should be cleaned every day, if you have an all-day run. If only used at night every other day will be sufficient. You can tell about this by looking into the condenser casing sideways when the arc is burning. If the glass appears clear and bright the lens is all right. If, however, it appears to be fast becoming tarnished, take them out and clean them. Wipe off the surface inside of the lamp house carefully every day. (9) The test lamp is the only method of testing for grounds I would recommend.

An Invitation.—The editor of this department is in receipt of a very neatly engraved invitation reading: "The Moving Picture and Projecting Machine Operators of San Francisco cordially invite you to attend the evening festivities of their seventh anniversary to be given at Toke Point Grill, 1727 O'Farrell Street, Friday, June 23, 1911, 12 o'clock midnight. Committee in charge: Mr. W. Osterfeldt, Mr. S. Gordon, Mr. H. Olsen, Mr. C. Sweeney, Mr. D. Lattimer."

Many thanks for the invitation, gentlemen, and if the new propellor for my air ship arrives in time you may certainly expect me to be present. However, that there will be there is some doubt about its arrival. Nevertheless, I shall propel my thoughts into your midst at about that time in the night on June 23d and I wish you a most enjoyable time. I trust that the coming year will bring all kinds of prosperity to your organization and its individual members.

License Wanted.—Oklahoma (name and town suppressed) writes: "I am operating in a city of 35,000 population, in which there is no Union. I wish to try working in some larger city. I believe all operators in New York and other large cities have to have a license. Now, what is bothering me is how to get that particular article, and how much it will cost. Is there any possible way to get a license without going out of this city?"

There is not. In order to receive a license in any city it is necessary that you make application in person and receive a personal examination as to your qualifications by the official or Board of Examiners, to which that duty is deputized. The highest cost I know of is $10 per year, in the city of Chicago. Many cities, however, including New York City, make no charge whatever.

Gate Trouble.—Ohio (name of town suppressed) writes: "Will you please tell me how to line up the sprockets? I have them all in line with each other and also with the aperture plate, but the picture shows a straight edge on the curtain. How do you set the outside shutter on the Edison type B?"

I was amused upon reading your first inquiry. You ask me how to line up the sprockets and then proceed to say they are already in line. The trouble does not lie in the sprockets, if they are in line, but is probably due to the fact that one of the tension springs sets out just a little too far and is covering one edge of the aperture. It is also possible that the gate itself sets too far to one side, though in that event the edge should show in the form of a shallow and not a straight line. I think you will find the tension spring is the guilty party. As to setting the outside shutter, turn your fly wheel backwards until the intermittent sprocket just barely begins to move; or, better yet, until the pin is just half its diameter in the star slot. Then set your shutter so that the wide blade has opened the lens just a little less than half, and it ought to be right. If it shows any travel ghost, move it just a little. If the travel ghost is down, revolve the top of the shutter towards you. If the travel ghost is up, push the top of the shutter away from you. To revolve the shutter first loosen the collar just outside the outer spindle boxing and slip the shaft in a trifle until its gear is unlocked. Later, it occurs to me that I don't remember which way the Edison Type B outside shutter runs. The direction as to which to move the shutter is correct; if the side next you to unravels up; but if it travels down, the direction must be reversed.

Very Angry.—San Francisco writes: "Say, man! I am some mad, and you are the indirect cause of the sudden increase in my temperature. I will, therefore, ship my troubles back to you. They say 'the pen is mightier than the sword,' but believe me, if I could only have the supreme pleasure of meeting the operator from North Tonawanda, N. Y., who sent in the drawing for installation of outside shutter on the Motiograph (page 1198, May 27th issue), I would most assuredly choose the latter and use it effectively, too. I worked industriously for two days on that shutter and saw shutters in my dreams, until finally I came to the conclusion that the brother operator also had indulged in a nightmare and was still in a trance when he drew that diagram. He is quite right when he says there is no flicker with the 1½-inch blade. There is absolutely none, but my, oh, my! what a travel ghost. For goodness' sake don't let him get away without giving us a photo of his invention. If he says he gets a good picture with that shutter he has certainly omitted some important detail from his diagram and explanation. Let us hear more about it. Now, just a word to Mansfield, Mass. (same issue), who is having trouble with oily film. Your idea, Friend Richardson, of breaking the head of a large needle on to it will pick up one drop of oil when dipped in the can, doesn't appeal to me as being practical, when you stop to consider the fact that there are thirty odd oil holes in a Motiograph machine and some of these holes in position which could not be readily reached with a drop of oil balanced on a needle. It would necessitate your getting down on all fours or so earlier to do this little stunt. The idea of just a drop or two of oil is all right, but why not use a fountain pen filler. Here is our method of oiling: Use a heavy grade of oil, applied with a pen filler, on all parts, with the exception of the cam and star casing. This we take apart and pack with a solidified oil called Mobilubricant, obtainable at any automobile garage, price, 25 cents per pound can. About once a week we remove the objective lens and plate and cut out a piece of ordinary blotting paper in such shape that it will fit the bottom of the machine casing, just under the star and cam casing. This will absorb all surplus oil and your troubles are at an end. And now for a couple of questions: Is the Taylor School for Operators still in existence? What is the rate for current in New York proper? We pay 2½ cents per k.w. Is there another city in the United States with a lower rate? If you happen to know of any operator contemplating removing to Frisco, just tell him that he may leave his pliers and screwdriver at home and come prepared to do the heavies with a section gang at $1.40 per day. We have any number of operators who only a short time ago were drawing $30 a week, but to-day are to be found picking fruit at that price per month; which is enough said. I will anxiously await the photo of that outside shutter."

If you will look at my comments on the article by Tonawanda, you will notice that I myself was skeptical as to the possibility of such a shutter delivering the goods. I think you will find I said that the blade of the shutter would have to be very much wider; also that I wrote Tonawanda two or three times to find out if he had not omitted something. That such a shutter could work successfully would be impossible, since it would only barely cover the lens and make no provision for the time during which the film is traveling. Tonawanda has been a good correspondent of this department and has set forth some excellent ideas. In this particular proposition, however, there is a screw loose somewhere and I will have to pass the whole proposition up to our brother out in Western New York. If such a shutter really would work, it would be an immense saving in current, since it would only cut but a very slight percentage of the light, as against the from 41 to 52 per cent. cut by all standard machines. The pen filler idea is excellent. I omitted to state the fact that to use the needle one should pour out some oil in a shallow vessel, such as the lid of a baking powder can. It is a good method of oiling, but I think myself the pen filler would probably be even better. The Motiograph machine has quite a number of oil holes, but I have oiled one around in three or four minutes comfortably, wiping off the surplus oil at the same time. With the needle, of course, it would take considerably longer. I will, however, apologize and accept the pen filler idea. Yes, the Taylor School is still doing business. The rate for current in New York varies somewhat. The new scale is ten cents per k.w. for the first 250; nine cents for the next 250; eight for the next, and seven for the next, down to a five-cent minimum on quantity or excess over 1,500 k.w. hours. I know of no city in the United States which furnishes current at anything like the rate you name. The best record I have, even of a private plant, that is to say a plant owned by the theater, is 3¼ cents per k.w. Will San Francisco kindly tell us how full he fills the intermittent oil casing and how many hours run one filling will serve. Does the heavy grease make any appreciable difference in the running of the machine—make it run harder, I mean?

Another Victim of the Law.—Coney Island writes: "Being an Englishman, I am a victim of the non-citizen law. Could you in any way put me in touch with a position where one doesn't have to be a citizen? I have worked down here in one house for three years and know my business thoroughly. Can do my own repairing and have no objections to going anywhere, provided the salary be not less than $25 per week. Will furnish references upon request."

It is useless to again set forth my opinion of the fool law which deprives this brother of the right to earn his daily bread in the city of New York simply because he happens to be technically a subject of Great Britain. To anyone desiring to give the brother employment I will cheerfully send his address.

New Form of Shutter.—Chicago, Ill., writes: To those having trouble with terminals burning off when using A. C., I would suggest the use of the Vitagraph lamp. With lamp they will have no trouble of that kind. I always guarantee the manager a perfect show, so far as the light is concerned, and, as to the film, I have run two and one-half months without even a frame-up. I look over my film very carefully, even though it be first run. Here is one for the boys to try out. Make a revolving shutter similar to the one they now have in their machine, but make the wide blade 3-16 to ¼ inch wider than that of the regular shutter. Drill three rows of holes along the edges of the blade, the outside ones larger than the middle row and the inside smaller. They will find that it helps to eliminate the flicker and has a tendency to dissolving instead of shutting off the light abruptly. It works fine on my machine, and I have A. C., too. Patrons ask the manager why it hurts their eyes in other theaters, but never in his. I will write you later on other things. I am always a reader of the 'Moving Picture World' and I have learned volumes through your department."

The shutter scheme, Chicago, is one in which, frankly, I haven't any large degree of faith; still it won't be much bother for those interested to try it out. The holes drilled in the edge of the blade, as shown by an accompanying sketch, are along both edges of both the flicker and the wide blade, three rows along each edge. The inner row is very small, the middle row a little larger and the outer row, I should say, 1-16th or maybe about 3 32nds of an inch in diameter. The three rows, I should suppose, ought to occupy about 3-8ths of an inch in width. One reason I say I haven't much faith in this scheme lies in the fact that almost every imaginable kind of a shutter has been tested out by the different manufacturers. In the Nicholas Power Company's factory is a wire loop, upon which are strung possibly as many as a hundred different types of shutters that have been tried out in their No. 4 and 5 machines. Some have perforated blades; some have five or six blades; some have blades made of mica; some have curved blades, and, in fact, almost every design one could think of is on that wire, but after trial they have all been discarded and are merely kept as curiosities. However, as I say, it will do operators no harm to experiment with such things and in all probability they will acquire more or less knowledge in the process, even though the experiment be not successful.

Rheostat Amperages.—St. Louis, Mo., writes: "Will you please give me some idea of the number of amperes furnished by the Powers 220-volt rheostat when used on 110 volts?"

The rheostat you presumably mean is the 220-volt round, adjustable rheostat, which has 14 adjustment contacts. When it is hitched in on 110-volts in series with an arc, factory tests show the rheostat to deliver the following amperages on the different contacts, the arc being kept at normal length: Numbering the contacts from 1 to 14, beginning on the 220-volt side, when the handle is turned clear around to contact No. 1 (there are really no numbered contacts, but I am simply supposing them to be numbered), the rheostat delivers 13 amperes; contact No. 2 delivers 15 amperes; No. 3, 16 amperes; Nos. 4 and 5, 17 amperes; Nos. 6 and 7, 21 amperes; No. 8, 26 amperes; No. 9, 28 amperes; No. 10 and 11, 34 amperes; No. 12, 60 amperes, at which point the coils become red hot. The same rheostat on 220 volts on the contact No. 1 delivers 28 amperes; on contact No. 2, 32 amperes. I have no available record of the amperage of the other contacts when used on 220. When this rheostat is used with the two halves in multiple on 110 volts, with the handle on contact No. 1, it delivers 43 amperes; on the second contact, 51 amperes, and on the third, 60 amperes, at which point it becomes red hot. While I am about it, having these records at hand, I might as well give the readers of the department the data on the other Powers rheostats. I might add that I will be glad to publish similar data on the rheostats of any of the manufacturers, if they will supply same. The Powers 110-volt non-adjustable underwriters, commonly known as the 25-ampere rheostat, delivers 23 amperes on 110 volts; 24½ amperes on 115 volts; 26½ amperes on 120 volts. The Powers 110-volt adjustable rheostat, same as the underwriters, but adjustable, delivers as follows: on 110 volts, first contact, 23 amperes; second, 24½; third, 26½; fourth, 28 amperes, at which point the wires become dull red, and on the last contact, 33 amperes with the wires red hot. On 115 volts it delivers: first contact, 24½; second, 26; third, 29; fourth, 32, at which point the wires become red. On 120 volts it delivers: first contact, 26½ amperes; second, 28 amperes; third, 30 amperes, at which point the wires become dull red. The small Powers circular 120 volt, adjustable rheostat, when worked on 120 volts, delivers as follows: When the handle is set so that the resistance all in, 30 amperes; on the second and third contacts, 34 amperes, at which point the wires become dull red; on the fourth contact it delivers 39 amperes, when the wires become red hot. When working on 110 volts, with the handle set so that the resistance all in, 25 amperes; second and third contacts, 28 amperes; fourth and fifth contacts, 32 amperes; sixth contact, 40 amperes, with the wires red hot. In this connection, however, it must be taken into consideration that the rheostats on which these tests were made were new. After the resistance has been in use for some time the amperage will be considerably reduced. I would suggest to the various manufacturers that the publication of this kind of data concerning their resistance devices would be of considerable value to operators, and repeat that if the same is furnished I will be only too glad to give it space.

Letter Overlooked.—Cleveland, O., writes under date of June 1, as follows, the latter having apparently been mislaid: "I have read with interest the columns of the Trouble Department and have received some very useful and helpful information therefrom. I am running a Lubin machine and have been having trouble with the lower loops getting too big and running out over the back of the machine, but this does not effect the upper loop by making it smaller. The lower sprocket does not seem to be loose. At first I thought the trouble was from that source. Could it be on the gearing of the machine? The result has just recently shown up though I have had the machine for nearly a year and until lately it has proven very satisfactory. Can you suggest any remedy? I have read a note some time ago in which some one instead of an arc light used it has proven successful, giving a bright, clear picture with not anywhere nearly as much heat."

I am not very familiar with the Lubin machine, I confess, but the fault, in all probability lies in lack of proper adjustment of your lower sprocket idlers. As one sees while the Lubin has one idler or two, on the lower sprocket, but in any event the idler or idlers should be set away from the sprocket by about twice the thickness of the film and not that way. It is possible that the sprocket teeth are very badly worn, in which case you should have a new sprocket. The trouble does not lie in the gears of your machine, but wholly and entirely with the sprocket or idlers, possibly a combination of worn sprocket and poor adjustment of idlers. The enlargement of the lower loop would of course have no effect whatever on the upper loop. That you can use the Nernst current for the projection of moving pictures seems impossible, or I might say impossible. I should like to have a photograph of your lamp house with those glowers in place and be informed as to what size picture you are projecting. The Nernst glower has up to date been found impractical for projection, except for small advertising stereopticons, which throw a picture only about 3 feet square.

Replies to Oklahoma.—Two weeks ago we published a request from Oklahoma for five high-class operators. The response was astonishing, there being even some telegrams of appreciation. Two unions offered to furnished the whole quota of men, and replies came in from individuals all over the United States. These have all been forwarded to the party in Oklahoma. There is bound to be considerable disappointment, however, since there are only five places to fill and applications galore.

Single Arc Dissolver.—Savannah, Ga., writes: "I have heard something of a dissolving stereopticon that operates with only one arc lamp. Could you give me some description of this machine, and is it a practical proposition?"

The only dissolver which I know of that operates with one illuminant is one made by Mr. Eberhard Schneider, of this city. As you will see by the picture, this dissolver operates with a right angle, or 90 degrees arc, though it can also be used with the regular projection arc lamp. The rays of light from the arc pass through the prisms and are refracted by them into the condensers, dissolving being accomplished by means of the usual diaphragm arrangement in front of the objective lenses. There is no question but what the machine is practical. I have seen it demonstrated and the projection was excellent, also the dissolving effect was perfect.

Light Reflection.—New Orleans, La., writes: "Can you give me the comparative reflecting powers of different colors when used for wall and ceiling decoration?"

The different colors reflect light as follows: A perfect mirror reflects 95 per cent. of the light; the ordinary commercial mirror, 87 per cent.; white blotting paper, 82 per cent.; white glazed paper, 81 per cent.; chrome yellow, 62 per cent.; orange, 50 per cent.; pink, 36 per cent.; emerald green, 18 per cent.; dark brown, 13 per cent.; black, 5 per cent.

Light Trouble.—Murfreesboro, Tenn., writes: "Being a reader of your department and having derived much benefit therefrom, I am now going to ask a few questions. We run only one show a night; A. C. 110-volt current; have a throw of 50 feet; 12-foot picture; 1900 Motiograph two-wing shutter, also Motiograph lamp house and rheostat. My rheostat is stamped 25 amperes, but I know it does not pass that much current. Here are a few questions: Sometimes there is a small ghost straight across the center of my picture. When I bring my carbons very close together it somewhat diminishes the ghost. After I run the first reel nearly through, my carbons burn the crater flat, causing a very bad light. I am using an ordinary cloth curtain stretched over a frame, the same having several coats of alabastine. Can you suggest how I can get better results, and do you think my picture is too large for the length of throw, using 25 amperes at 110 volts? I enclose a stamp and ask you to reply, by mail, so that I will not have to wait so long."

I have spent one whole day wandering around over the battlefield adjacent to your city and have rubbered at the bullet-holes in the east iron columns of your court house, Murfreesboro. This was about six years ago. I do not and cannot reply personally to letters. If I did so I would be swamped with letter writing. As to your trouble, I do not see how you can possibly project a good 12-foot picture with 25 amperes of current. If you have a rheostat stamped 25 amperes and it has been in use for any considerable period of time, it is in all probability not delivering more than 20 and possibly even less than that. I would suggest that you either procure another rheostat and hitch it in multiple, or, what is much better, that you get some good operating room transformer, such as the inductor, compensarc, etc. These transformers are somewhat expensive in the first cost, but if you are on metered service they ordinarily would save a great deal on your light bill, at the same time giving you a far better illumination. However, if you are using only 20 amperes the saving would not be very much, but the increase in curtain brilliancy would be very great indeed. Inasmuch as you say that the ghost only occurs occasionally, I am led to suppose that it is through some fault of the carbon setting and I do not think you will have much success in remedying the same so long as you use that exceedingly light amperage. If you can get a really good 12-foot picture with 20 amperes, or even 25 amperes, of A. C., my dear boy, you can do more than I have ever seen done to date. As to your craters burning flat, I would suggest that you send $1.50 to the Moving Picture World for a copy of my Handbook. You will find therein, besides much other valuable information, complete illustrated directions for setting carbons, both for direct and alternating current. I think the more than two thousand purchasers of the Handbook will bear me out in the statement that you will get full value for your money in the book. In the back numbers of the department you will find instructions from several operators and managers for coating the curtain with aluminum. I would suggest that you follow out one of the recipes and you will, I believe, be well repaid for the slight expense entailed.

Strike in Cleveland.—The following telegram came to hand just in time to get it in type:

"Cleveland, Ohio, June 20th. Operators in down-town houses are on strike. No notice was given and arbitration was refused, the Avenue Theater being the only down-town house accepting terms. Signed, B. G. Drummond."

Sorry to hear of the trouble in Cleveland. I do not exactly understand whether the "no notice" refers to operators or managers, or whether it was the operators or the managers who refused arbitration. By the next edition, however, we shall undoubtedly have further information.

INTERRUPTED FILM SERVICE.

From St. Mary's, W. Va., comes the tale of a peculiar incident about a manager of a five-cent theater who sub-lets his films to the nickelodeons in some of the small villages in the surrounding country. One day he was somewhat surprised to receive this message. "Don't send any more films, as Bill Jones is dead." For the rest of the day the manager pondered over the situation and tried to think who Bill Jones was, and in what way he was connected with the moving picture industry, but to no avail. Finally, curiosity got the better of him, and he made up his mind to find out what Bill Jones had to do with the case. He found out as follows: The picture man in that small town rents all his chairs from the undertaker, but as Bill Jones was a prominent resident, the chairs which were rented had to be called for by the undertaker; therefore, no show could take place until after the funeral.

EMPIRE FILM EXCHANGE SPRUCES UP.

The uplift and solidity of the business has received a boost on Fourteenth Street. It was long in coming, Kessell, but when you went at it you did it right. The writer had occasion to enter the Empire Film Exchange one day last week and stopped short on the threshold. Had we made a mistake and entered the office of a bank or large corporation? No. There were the same familiar faces, and from a far corner Ad. Kessell waved an inviting salute. Mahogany furniture and soft green carpets bedecked the office; silent salesmen showcases lined the showroom; nothing remained of the old furniture and even the walls had taken on a lining of embossed metal work. The floor above is given up to the film rental department, with everything for the convenience of the employee. When an upstart concern fits up elaborate offices it is done for effect. When an old-established house that has borne the brunt of adversity bedecks itself it is a sign of prosperity and self-respect. We congratulate Mr. Kessell on his layout.

BOSTON.

The Jolliette Theater, Bowdoin Square, ran the "Fall of Troy" the week of June 19-24. This reel was the cause of a successful week's business for the Jolliette. Since the house has been under new management, the "Fall of Troy" was the first "special feature" exhibited in the Jolliette. Under the former manager, Mr. J. L. Roth, the Jolliette earned a conspicuous name for itself, as a house running nearly every feature photoplay available for Independent theaters. So the Jolliette must exhibit "features" real often if the name of the house is to be kept up to old standards in this respect.

The Old South Theater, Washington Street, was closed on Sunday night, June 18, by express order of Chief of Police Whitney. On June 11, Chief Whitney was present at the performance presented by the Old South, and at that time chanced to hear a parody sung, in a vaudeville act, which he considered suggestive and not proper for presentation at a public resort. The chief caused this act to be removed from the stage immediately. The suspension of the Sunday license was the penalty paid by the Old South. At this writing, it is not at all certain whether the chief will issue the special Sunday evening license to the Old South for June 25th. The chief has stated that the offense seemed more serious than it ordinarily would, owing to the fact that the house had been specially warned by him in the not very distant past that suggestive acts would not be allowed on the stage. It is a pity that Cinematographic—by high art—should be so insulted and so degraded by being placed on the self-same bill as a lewd song. It is to be hoped that Manager Nat Burgess will exercise a more watchful vigilance over his programs from now on.

The World's New England representative in a recent issue of this paper published an article, "Balancing the Program," which noted the fact that a moving picture show is much more enjoyable and liable to prove a success should the program of pictures be balanced with care and judgment. He also stated that many managers do not care for this special detail, but allow the reels to be exhibited in any order that may happen to be the easiest. A reply to the article can be noted in this paper, issue of June 24, from the pen of Mr. J. J. Rieder, of Jackson, Mich. Mr. Rieder claims that "Henry" should not blame the manager for a poorly balanced picture program—it is the fault of the exchange-man, who hands over to the exhibitor any old junk he sees fit, which cannot be balanced in any way—this is the contention of Mr. Rieder. Such a state of affairs as Mr. Rieder outlines in his letter, anent affairs in Michigan, is to be deplored. The World's New England representative wishes to remark that his article was written from observations carried on though New England—not in any other portion of the country. And the result of his observations has been that many moving picture shows are poorly (or not at all) balanced, and that the manager is almost always the sole culprit. This is owing to the fact that the very great majority of New England houses are running pictures picked by their managers. Sometimes his choice is not absolute, but he always is allowed a great deal of leeway in his wants. More often, however, the show is entirely chosen by some representative of the theater, either by viewing them "run off" at the exchange or through the medium of the manufacturers' advertisements, bulletins, etc. With this fact in mind, Mr. Rieder will no doubt agree that, in New England at least, poorly balanced programs are distinctly "up to the manager."

Managers hereabouts know of what their programs will consist nearly four days in advance of actual exhibition. A convention of moving picture managers of Michigan is badly needed, judging from Mr. Rieder's letter, which throws light on several evils of serious import in Michigan. Why not organize, Michigan?

It is interesting to note the result of a canvas of Boston moving picture houses made by a local manager, in company with his vaudeville agent. On a certain evening these two men dropped into nearly every house in Boston proper. The result of this observation was that the Olympic Theater, Bowdoin Square, held the greatest number of people in its auditorium. Manager Roth should be pleased to note this pleasing fact.

HENRY.

THE NAT WILLS POSTER.

Nat Wills in his time may have had some gay lithographs of himself as an actor and as a star, but never in his life has he been the subject of such an elaborate poster as that which has been got out by the Powers Motion Picture Company to inaugurate his entry into the moving picture field.

We reproduce herewith a poster by the famous artist, "Pal," of the Courier Lithographing Company, of Buffalo, N. Y., and we wish you could see it in the full colors. It is one of the dreamiest things you ever gazed upon, and, as you can see for yourself, it shows Nat surrounded in a very agreeable way by a trio of mystical seraphs, or mermaids or dream babies, or whatever else you wish to call them. Whatever they are, they look good to us, and we are rather inclined to envy Nat his very close proximity to three such very agreeable looking creatures.

This poster represents the last word in lithographic art. The colors are soft, seductive and quiet, and a beautiful color harmony pervades the whole. One can get an idea of these value when it is known that each one of these posters was posted at a cost of 25 cents per copy. At the time of the Powers fire there were 5000 of these beautiful pictures destroyed, and the same amount had to be ordered again. So when the exhibitor gets his poster, he can look at it and consider that it is the most expensive moving picture poster on record, because every one of them, on account of the regard that Nat and Pat Powers, exactly fifty cents apiece.

Have you noticed that the MOVING PICTURE WORLD is twelve pages larger than it was two weeks ago? Watch it grow.

Joseph A. Oliver.

The picture personality presented herewith is that of Joseph A. Oliver, who recently joined the Pathe Western Stock Company to play character leads, and other important characters parts. Mr. Oliver is well known throughout the United States by reason of his forty years' experience on the legitimate stage, during which time he has appeared in many important parts in the plays of the period, and in the older plays of comic opera fame.

Mr. Oliver began his professional career before the footlights when he joined the John T. Ford Stock Company, of Baltimore, which at the time was one of the greatest stock companies in America, and which included among its famous players such names as Robert Downing, the Chapman Sisters, George Edison, and others whose names are now only a memory to old-time theatrical men, but who at the time were stars in their profession.

Mr. Oliver created the part of the original tramp in "Princess Toto," by Gilbert & Clay, produced by the Henderson Opera Company at the Standard Theater, New York. Other members of note in the company who scored heavily in this production were: William Hamilton, W. A. Paul, Mme. Braham, M. Lucette, Mme. Zeabau. Mr. Oliver was also one of the first boatswains with the Boston production of "Pinafore," and included in the cast were May Irwin, Flo Irwin, George Ulmer, and others of note.

Mr. Oliver then joined the Adelphi Stock Company, which played in Chicago before the great Chicago fire, during which the theater was destroyed. Following the destruction of the Adelphi Theater, he played for years in repertoire throughout the country with various companies of note at the time. For five seasons Mr. Oliver played with the C. W. Park Dramatic Company, a stock organization well known throughout the South. For the last three seasons he played with the Price & Butler Stock Company. Previous to this, Mr. Oliver played several seasons with the John Guerin Stock Company, at Fargo, N. D. He also played three seasons at Taranta's Theater, New Orleans.

Mr. Oliver has also had experience in theater management, having previously managed a stock company at Leadville, Col., and the Broadway Theater, St. Louis, during the recent World's Fair. Few men on the stage today have trod the boards of the legitimate so long or so ably as the subject of this sketch. The film world in general, and the Pathe Company especially, are indeed fortunate to have engaged the services of such a professional, winning him from the legitimate to give his undeniable talents to the pleasing of millions, and helping to keep on its high pedestal the art of acting before the camera.

Mr. Oliver is 63 years of age. It is to be hoped that the Grim Reaper will spare him another score in which to amuse and entertain the amusement loving public. He is an all-around, versatile, finished actor, and in several interior scenes taken at the Pathe Studio recently the writer of this brief biography, and other spectators, watched his work with pleasure.

Moving Pictures of the Powers Fire

One of the Most Remarkable Fire Films Ever Made.

At a private exhibition this week, we had the privilege of looking at the picture that cost Mr. P. A. Powers $150,000—the burning of the Powers plant, or home of the Powers Picture Plays, at 241st Street and Richardson Avenue, New York City, on the afternoon of June 6th. Our expectations on the way to view this reel were not very great. We expected to see the usual fire picture, showing a lot of smoke and promiscous running about, but when the reel was finished we realized that we had been looking at what will no doubt prove to be the greatest actual fire picture ever taken.

It does not often happen that a moving picture photographer is at hand when a fire breaks out, and this instance is the first time that a film factory has been wiped out. There are many moving pictures extant of fires that have already begun and are considerably under way, but we do not remember of any fire picture that has been taken from the very beginning, even before the fire department arrived upon the scene. This picture shows the burning of the Powers plant from the very beginning; from the time when the first faint streaks of smoke appear at the windows and doors until the building it at last consumed in a seething mass of flames. Owing to the vast amount of celluloid stored in the building, the Powers fire lasted only half an hour. Within thirty minutes from the time the fire broke out, the place was a flat ruin upon the ground.

In this respect, then, the film differs from most fire pictures, because it is seldom possible to show the beginning and end of a fire with all the details that should come in between. We see at first the excited employees running about. Later on, the fire department arriving and stretching its lines. The picture should be of interest to residents of that section of New York City, because it shows very plainly the poor water pressure in that particular district. For some time the firemen were unable to raise a stream more than a few feet in height, and during that time were practically of no service.

After viewing the picture we desire to confirm our previous statement of the cool-headedness of the operator, Mr. Al. Leach. He not only took motion photographs of the fire, but he took them in a professional manner. In the picture there were no traces of hurry or excitement on his part. The picture seemed to have been taken in the most coolly calculated manner. The lines were well squared up and the positions well chosen.

Wherever the fire seemed to be raging the most, there Mr. Leach was to be found with his camera. After looking at this picture of the fire, we know as much about it as though we had been standing right there on the scene at the time. The picture brings back to our minds with double force the wonders of Cinematography. This picture is perhaps one of the very few bona fide photographs of a fire from its very start, before even the fire department had arrived. It is a remarkable piece of work and we know in advance that wherever this picture is shown it is going to be talked about, and will be one of the biggest film sensations of the season.

At this writing, it is not certain whether the Powers Company intends to introduce a story into this fire picture, or whether to release it as a straight educational reel. In our opinion, it will go well either way, because it is real. The Powers people may deem it wise to work a story around their unfortunate fire, but we do not think it necessary. It is one of those pictures that will draw on its own merits and one that should be kept in a theater for more than one day, because those who see it are bound to return home and tell their relatives and friends what a wonderful fire picture they have seen. It is difficult to describe in words what can be described by means of motion pictures. Our descriptions of this film has been very meagre. Our advice to the exhibitor is to take it as quickly as he can get it, and keep it as long as he is allowed to, within the limits of reason. We have made some very strong statements on behalf of this film, but we do not think that they are strong enough. The Powers Fire picture is one that can be exhibited for years without losing its interest.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

SYNCHRONIZATION.

Redondo Beach, Cal., June 7, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World,

Dear Sir: In your issue of April 22nd there appeared an article relative to talking pictures headed "A Wonderful Invention—Coming." While the writer of that article was writing in a prophetic strain, he was, as a matter of fact, though he little knew it, stating conditions as they now are.

The talking picture is an accomplished fact, and the trick has been turned by a Frenchman, as predicted in the article referred to, but it happens in this case to be a naturalized American citizen of French birth.

To those who were familiar with the moving picture industry in its infancy, the name E. H. Amet is well known. Mr. Amet invented, manufactured and put on the market one of the first projecting machines, "The Amet Magniscope" (see cut). He also was closely associated with the perfecting of the early talking machine which made possible the present cheap phonograph.

Mr. Amet in his laboratory located in this city has been quietly working for some months past to perfect a talking picture machine, and to one who is fortunate enough to gain admission and see a demonstration, no doubt it will remain in their minds that the goal has been reached. Not only has he accomplished perfect synchronization, but the sound is made to come from the location on the screen from which it should proceed; if a gun is fired from a distant point, the sound comes from the distance; if a train is seen approaching, the sound follows the train, increasing in volume as the train draws near. Birds are singing in the trees. The wind, the dashing of the waves on the rocks, etc., are all true to nature, and the same is true of any sound that should properly belong to any picture being shown.

As soon as patent papers are complete, a public demonstration will be given in the above theater.

Sincerely yours,

F. R. FANCHER.

WHEN EXCHANGE AND EXHIBITOR WORK IN HARMONY.

Editor Moving Picture World,

Chambersburg, Pa., June 17, 1911.

Dear Sir: In reading Mr. Rieder's letter in The World this week on balancing the program, one would be led to believe that all film exchanges were alike and handed the exhibitor just what they felt like. I run the entire licensed output ten days old in my theater; therefore, I have no selection to make or no program to balance other than arrange the reels the way they should be run. I am on a scheduled service and always know two weeks or more ahead what is coming. I knew ten days ago that I would have "Faust" on June 27th; also when I would have "Enoch Arden" and "Ten Nights in a Bar Room" and the film exchange that supplies me is the General Film Co., of Wilkes-Barre. There are other film exchanges, but here is one office that has a system.

It has always been my policy to advertise the films, and before getting on this schedule service I always had the film exchange wire me at my expense the evening before what films I would have the next day, so that I could advertise them in the morning paper. We do not claim to have the finest picture house in the world, but I do not know of another house in the State that runs the licensed output as new as we do, and for brightness and steadiness they are second to none.

Yours truly,

H. R. WEBER,
Proprietor Star Theater.

ABOUT LIGHTED AUDITORIUMS.

Editor Moving Picture World,

Dear Sir: Being in the motion picture business, I am greatly interested in all its branches, especially in the projection department, and if I am allowed a little space in your valuable paper, would like to express my opinion.

Let us begin with law. If a man commits suicide, if a woman runs away from home, or if a child commits some wrong, newspaper men point with a satisfied smile towards the two magic words, moving pictures, as the cause; not only that but a new law is passed. If we really stop to think, there are more laws concerning this business than it takes to run the whole nation. If more are passed, this business will be a thing of the past. I am interested in one of these laws: "Well Lighted Theaters."

It is causing considerable trouble; patrons are making unpleasant remarks concerning poor projection. It is true projection as yet is not perfected, but will still be worse when all theaters must be "well lighted."

The law is passed for the good of the business, but why shall the respectable theaters be classed with the disgraceful den—yes, that is the only suitable name for them! On one occasion I visited one of these shows. When a certain picture ended I asked one sitting next to me what he thought of it. The answer I got was, "I don't know, I didn't see it," and he was right; his mind and thoughts were somewhere else. The exhibitor is also wise, his films are old, worn, commercial. He saves money.

Again I ask, should good clean and respectable houses suffer the same as these? The law should not demand them to light up; to close them up would be more suitable.

Photoplays are transparent photographs; light projects them. Therefore it must be dark for good results.

The pictures are projected best and appreciated most in large theaters. Why?—because you are viewing them from a darkened auditorium.

A. J. OHLSON.

UNIFORMS.

During the hot days, the Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Animals forces the teamsters to cover the top of the head of their horses with either a wet sponge or a straw hat, and establish drinking fountains, with attendants, to see that the horses are properly watered. These good folks who are so solicitous for horses, dogs, cats and even rats, have less charity for human beings. It is a shame for a M. P. exhibitor to allow his doormen and ushers to suffer, buttoned in their heavy winter uniforms, while these men could be made more comfortable in white duck suits. You want as good an attendance during the hot days as you have during the winter months. You spend much money on fans, on ice, on signs claiming that the inside of your theater is so many degrees less than the heat of the street, etc. At the same time you overlook the main point. Persons passing in the street do not see how many fans you have; they don't know how much ice you use to cool the interior, but they see your doorman tired and wornout, buttoned in his heavy winter uniform; they see his discomfort; they see the perspiration covering his hands and dropping from his face; they naturally, very naturally, come to the conclusion that your theater must be a real oven. They see another thing. The girl cashier fanning herself as if she was suffocating in her box. Why not correct these evils? Why not give to your attendants light, comfortable, white duck uniforms? Make them look clean, neat and cool; you will then create the impression that your place is a real cool place, a good place to rest in and escape the boiling sun rays. Why not have an open ticket box for the summer months? A white duck uniform in front of your theater will pay more than the most elaborate sign, because the cool, neat appearance of the wearer will tell the story better than words on a card board. Do not say that your theater is a cool place. Show that it is really; let your doorman prove how comfortable he is and how little he is affected by the heat.—J. M. B.

MUTT AND JEFF OUT WEST.

David Horsely, general manager of the Nestor Film Company, has just returned from a successful Western tour, showing advance views of the Mutt and Jeff series of comic pictures. Mr. Horsely states that he has been treated enthusiastically everywhere by exhibitors who, in all cases, have been more than anxious to meet him in the hope that he might be the man to deliver them from the avalanche of tragedy by coming across with a good sized load of ruined comedy. Mr. Horsely has made a very long trip covering as many as twenty of the large Western cities, exhibiting the Mutt and Jeff reels each day in one of the different theaters in all the cities visited.

From now on the Nestor artists will begin to turn out work overtime, for Mr. Horsely brought with him a large bundle of orders that will keep everybody hustling to all. Every manufacturer who makes an attempt at turning out some large production in the way of comedy, deserves commendation. But in this case Mr. Horsely deserves especial commendation for selecting such a well known pair of characters as Mutt and Jeff. It is not easy to bring such characters to life, and place them upon a moving picture screen, therefore, any manufacturer who makes such an attempt is deserving of all the encouragement that can be given him. If there are any faults in the beginning of such a production, they are most certain to be removed as one release follows another. In this way, then, we expect to see the Mutt and Jeff series, before many weeks have passed, take their place among the established headliners and become just as [illegible] of a Saturday night feature as the Salvation Army.

"The Tribe's Penalty" (Essanay).—Here is a thrilling Indian picture, the feature of which is the penalty a young brave suffers for befriending a white girl captured by his tribe. The girl's heroic ride, with the Indians in pursuit, is spectacular. The rattlesnake episode is well managed, but quite the strongest and most dramatic scene is where the young brave, discovering that his love for the white girl he has helped to escape is hopeless, goes stoically back to his tribe, submits to the humiliation by the squaws and expiates his offense at the stake.

"Money in the Bank" (Kalem).—A comedy, the scenes of which are laid in a boarding house. Bertie taken to task by his landlady for non-payment, finds a bankbook and manipulates the deposit record. Then he drops the book. The change in the attitude of the boarders, excepting the men, and the landlady, is marked. A wedding with her daughter follows. When the exposure comes the landlady philosophically accepts the situation.

"There's a Woman in Town" (Pathe).—Here is a comedy by the American Company, with the scenes laid in the West. It is extremely well acted, fresh and amusing. The heroine makes the cowboys crazy, much to the amusement of two punchers who have come in from a hard ride and seem immune to sentimentality or love yearnings. The things they buy and what they do are sufficient to supply ten minutes of amusement, and the audience testifies vigorously to its approval.

"A Hippopotamus Hunt" (Pathe).—A short film, but interesting while it lasts. It reproduces a hippopotamus hunt, showing exactly what the hunters do. It is a grand companion to the rhinoceros hunt put out by the same house some months ago. Under the magic of the Pathe photography, this film acquires added interest.

"Jimmie, the Insurance Agent" (Gaumont).—Here is a comedy presenting an original method of writing life insurance policies. The whole thing is a burlesque upon the life insurance business, but Jimmie's idea worked out well in this particular instance. Jimmy gets his policy, which, after all, is the main consideration. The fun may be impossible, but it is none the less lively and interesting.

"The City of Florence, Italy" (Gaumont).—Here is a series of attractive pictures made in the city of Florence, showing a considerable number of the most important monuments and buildings. The old and picturesque portion of the city is adequately represented, and the film closes with a view of the valley of the Arno, a wondrously beautiful scene.

"Duke de Ribbon Counter" (Lubin).—That this is an old subject matters very little, for it is freshly pictured and there's plenty of good fun in it still. Its background is summer-land and a big hotel, with contrasts in city pictures, Crane's office and Harold's hall bedroom. Miss Lawrence plays the heiress very well, of course, and Mr. Johnson plays the business man with much skill. Lack-a-daisical Harold is also commendable. The play exists solely for its fun; it isn't meant to be real, though the ending might have been more effective if Harold had dressed according to the condition of his pocket-book; it would have "rubbed it in" if he appeared with a soiled collar, and that was what was wanted. The photography of one scene, a stream and pine woods, is beyond praise.

"The Novice" (Selig).—This is not a very satisfactory picture. It isn't up to Selig standard except in its photography and scenery. The background is Southern California, and its Franciscan missions, and is very beautiful. The story is slight and not very well conducted. The play seems to have been designed either to picture a deeply religious nature who throws off the claims of the external world for monasterial life, a hero indeed, or one who is weakly sensitive and flies from the world. The hero is a duke and has a government, as many Spanish dukes had. He wants to become a monk; his uncle, who rules through him, doesn't want him to, so uses villainous means to hinder this. The uncle, it is suggested, has power over him; but supposing the uncle succeeds in keeping the youth from the monastery, it would be a dumb wit that couldn't see through this uncle's wiles. If the uncle was on the paternal side and had legal authority over the young duke, one would think that he would jump for joy at having the boy take religious vows of celibacy. The story is not convincing on the one hand and fails to make the duke seem heroic on the other.

"Enoch Arden" (Biograph).—Part II. We were delighted with the first part of the Biograph picture, but the second part is, it seems to us, deeper and more significant and much more interesting. This reviewer feels that he can not praise the characterization of Annie too highly. Tennyson's "Enoch Arden" is not a very wonderful poem. The poet was essentially a lyrist; he had very little dramatic instinct. One feels that there are finer things in the picture of Annie's heart than Tennyson even suspected; he certainly didn't express them. What one may call "the Bible scene" didn't for a moment even suggest the incident as given in the poem. This scene was not as good as that in the poem, but Annie, as pictured in other scenes, was a revelation. The rest of the picture is good. Like the first part, it has the true ocean spirit and the other fine qualities. The death of the last survivor but Enoch is pictured with remarkable power; it was awful. One cannot help praising it, but it was ugly in spite of its power; the horror of death was shown at the expense of its dignity.

"When the Tables Turned" (Melies).—This film has all the qualities that make a successful picture. It punchers take umbrage at a letter from a young lady who has merely read of cowboys, they are more sensitive than they should be. We can sympathize, however, with their making up a plan to surprise the young lady. The picture from this point on, when they capture the great actress who, to fool them, first plays that she is mad and then holds them up for all the queer tricks and foolish stunts they have in them—hopping, skipping, playing they are a brass band, and all—is simply rich. That doesn't exhaust what comedy is in the situation either, for when the other young lady arrives and the boys come to the pink tea, there is more fun. It took a true comedian to put a cup of tea in his pocket from embarrassment.

"Van Bibber's Experiment" (Edison).—This is a fine success. It shows how Van B. made a man of a convict just out from a term and unable to get work. Two of the Edison Company's best players take the leading parts and make a very praiseworthy picture of the situation. The scene where the convict, freed months earlier because of good conduct, comes unexpectedly to his wife, is fine; it's worth while seeing. Van Bibber and the clubman who lost his gems are also commendable in their lesser parts. The situation is one very worth while picturing; it is well conducted and very interesting.

"Forgiven in Death" (Essanay).—This story has the freshness of an actual record; yet the only two who know the story are massacred by Indians. It is, however, convincing as a supposititious explanation when perhaps the bodies of the two friends were found with clasped hands and the letters of Jack's wife, dated week by week, and only one opened, beside them. Jack seems foolish; he keeps his marriage a secret for fear of hurting Ned's feelings; but none can deny that there are fools in the world. The two hold the cabin for a while against a dozen Indians. Jack is the first to be shot, and then Ned brings him the letters which he had been holding back from jealousy. When Ned, too, is wounded, Jack forgives him and they die together.

"Faust" (Pathe).—This is another of Pathe's remarkable art films. It is finely colored and very well acted. A musical score has been arranged for an accompaniment and it adds much to the pleasure that these pictures of a great drama give. The educational value of such a film as this is very high. A bill with this film included can hardly fail of being distinguished.

"The Railroad Raiders of '61" (Kalem).—This is the only historical picture that this reviewer has seen that equals the best historical pictures made abroad. One may be forgiven if he thinks that it far excells them all in interest. Here is a picture of real men making real war. It's as exciting as the most sensational picture, yet, as far as one can see, not a grain of truth has been sacrificed to make it so. It's a picture in which every actor seems to be good with the best, and much time and pains were plainly spent in making it so perfect. The audience broke into it with applause and gave it a round at the end more enthusiastic than any that rewarded any song, dance or sketch with the living actors present and smiling across, a request for applause.

"The King's Daughter" (Gaumont).—It is hard to grasp just what motive made the Visigoth heroine of this picture sacrifice herself in just the way she did. She loved her father, the captive king of the Visigoths. She knew that the old man was about to kill the king, his captor, who had married her. She loved her husband, but couldn't denounce her father. She determined to save the king, but couldn't save her father, so she decided to wear the king's crown, receive the dagger and give her father a slight chance to escape. She acts the part fairly well, but the last scene is perfect in every way and extremely beautiful. The dead queen is enthroned and all the courtiers and the captives are compelled to pass and kneel. The old father, when he sees his daughter, confesses. The scenes are united.

"Th Society Girl and the Gypsy" (Pathe).—This is one of those stories whose main thread might be printed as the news of the day, but it is hardly convincing. As Mark Twain says, "Truth has an advantage over fiction, for fiction has to seem true." Society girls have fallen in love with gypsies; have run away and married them; have been ill treated and come back to ask parental pardon. Perhaps the reason why this picture fails to convince more powerfully than it does lies in the way it is conducted. There is Pathe art in all of the scenes, but the quickness with which the pictures follow each other without the suggestion that days intervene makes the girl seem over-quick to fall in love and mary the gypsy; again, the stranger who befriends her seems over-quick to ask her to be his wife after her gypsy husband dies. It is interestingly acted.

"Proving His Love" (Vitagraph).—It is good to see Florence Turner in the Vitagraph pictures again. While there may be one or two other photoplay artists who excel her in certain ways, there is none who approaches her in mobility of expression, both of hands and face, or in ability to fill with meaning the moments that precede, for instance, a smile. Her part in this picture fits her perfectly. Mr. Costello, playing opposite to her, represents the awakening and deepening of passion in a man's heart very well. The story is not new, but that is an advantage, for its interest depends on characterization. On the whole, it is one of the most beautiful pictures that this company has produced in some time, and that is saying much. The scene where Alice Gordon breaks the stem of the rose would alone, it seems, be the making of a picture.

"Range Pals" (Selig).—The picture of Steve's run from his home to the town is fine; it is much better than anything else in this picture, which isn't convincing. Would American fair play permit such a situation? This reviewer thinks it doubtful that any American sheriff would hang a man whom he knew to be innocent, though the Tyrant of Syracuse might. The picture isn't acted very well except by Steve, and then only when he is showing the labor of his great run. The story is a modern equivalent for the famous story of Damon and Pythias.

"The Trapper's Daughter" (Vitagraph).—This is another of the Vitagraph Company's stories of the Northwest in winter. These are all interesting and in many ways novel, and this not less so than the others. This company, though, is more successful in its portrayals of modern civilized life and its comedies.

"Her Brother's Photograph" (Edison).—This interesting melodrama has for its setting fashionable backgrounds in New York and a cabin of an engineer at work on the Panama Canal. The story is not wholly convincing, but it is very clearly told and is well constructed. It is fairly well acted.

"Bearded Youth" (Biograph).—Youth is not generally a handicap, yet, in the case of this young doctor, it was. A masquerade disguise makes him appear middle-aged and solves the problem. Just as a satisfactory solution is reached, an old maid falls in love with him and he is compelled to remove his disguise to escape her wiles. By this time he has demonstrated his worth, however, and there is no further difficulty about patients.

"The Delayed Proposal" (Biograph).—Here is a film showing how a country bumpkin undertook to win a gay soubrette. Clad in his store clothes, the young man studies a book entitled "How to Propose." The necessity for this educational process delays the proposal too long. The soubrette's city lover appears and poor Zeke has exerted his efforts for nothing. The comedy is good and the characterization is above the average.

"Over the Cliff" (Pathe).—Here is a tragedy which concerns a mountebank, his wife, a woman who alienated his affections and won him away from his wife. It also shows the murder of both the husband and the woman by the abused wife. After he has turned his wife out of their house on wheels and has taken in the other woman, the wife removes the blocking from under the wheels and the wagon goes over the cliff. In the wreck below she finds the dead bodies of the husband and his sweetheart. It is not a pleasant film, though the scene where the wagon goes over causes the audience to catch its breath.

"Max Comes Home" (Pathe).—Here is a short Max comedy which will keep them laughing. It details in a very graphic and humorous way the result of Max's return. It is short and snappy and will be an addition to any program.

"Winter Sports at Lucerne" (Pathe).—Here is an inviting subject for a hot day. The sports have all the spirit and dash of winter. The mechanical work is well done, each picture being clear and distinct, regardless of the rapid movement of the figures.

"The Misson Worker" (Selig).—Helen Maitland, daughter of a minster, devotes her life to the uplifting of the Chinese. A rich Chinaman falls in love with her. His friendliness angers Arthur Hadley, the girl's lover. He quarrels with her and they separate. But Helen discovers afterward that the Chinese go from her school to the gambling den. Then, in strong scenes, she shows that she is honest, and not only renounces her useless and unappreciated work but wins back her lover. Winifred Greenwood, as Helen Maitland, is convincing, and T. J. Carrigan as Arthur Hadley is an acceptable lover. Rex de Rosselli plays the part of Hing Lee, the wealthy Chinese, with appreciation.

"A Thoroughbred" (Edison).—Here is a racing story told with all the vim and vigor of out-doors. Two rivals in love own fast horses and the two animals are pitted against each other. One of these is the hero and one the villain, so we have the situation. The hero Farley decides to ride his horse himself, and wins. The girl does not hesitate to let him know that his suit has assumed a new aspect in her eyes.

The three horses taking part in the race are from a well known stable and make a good picture. There is an exciting struggle when the winner passes the second horse by half a length. It looks like an actual race. The entire picture is satisfactory and brings applause.

"His Leap for Liberty" (Gaumont).—Here is a film telling over again the story of love, and a rival, with a robbery and the accusation of the wrong man. He manages to escape from his captors and ultimately proves his innocence through a series of rather impossible events. The real thief is promptly arrested and presumably the lovers live happily ever after. Like most of the Gaumont outdoor pictures, there are some scenes in this which are well worth while without any reference to the story connected.

"Jiggers Buys a Watch Dog" (Gaumont).—Here is a humorous skit which shows how the onlookers obtained their revenge upon Jiggers for not tipping them when he bought his dog. It is lively while it lasts and has the additional merit of being short.

"A Cure for Dyspepsia" (Edison).—This little comedy makes fun of Papa. Papa sees Sis's beau, who is a rent collector, coming out of a saloon, and he "goes up in the air"; he is a strict temperance man and won't put up with such a young man, nor will he listen to explanations. This brings on another attack of his old ailment, and he goes for his medicine. Mamma had emptied the bottle and refilled it with "cooking" brandy. Pa gets a good jag. Sis and her beau make use of his predicament. Papa acts his part very well except that just for the time while he is making Sis and the beau promise not to tell, he is sober. Some may see something not wholly commendable in the situation.

"A Comedy of Understanding" (Edison).—This is an interesting picture of feet. Feet have as much character as have hands or faces. The Edison Company found an interesting collection of them to step over a puddle; they show coyness, mischief, fear, anger, indignation and other human feelings.

Independent.

"All Alone" (Reliance).—A highly emotional drama, representing the mental anguish of a girl torn with the conflict of two loves, one for her mother she has sworn never to leave and one for the lover who came unexpectedly into her lonely life. True to her vow, however, she gives up the lover. Shortly afterward her mother dies, and the film closes with the girl contemplating her blighted hopes for future happiness, the worries of the past, broken hopes for the future. It would be difficult to conceive any more sorrowful combination.

"Hotel Thieves" (Great Northern).—This film affords sufficient excitement for once. Thieves are seen at work. Sherlock Holmes is engaged to run down the criminals, and the adventures which befall him are much more numerous and serious than is usually the case with this detective. But even though hurled from a train and subjected to much other unkind, not to say severe, treatment he succeeds in rolling the arch criminal over a precipice in Switzerland, half a world away.

"Foolshead, Somnambulist" (Itala-).—Another of the popular Foolshead films that kept them laughing. Foolshead is generally a source of much hilarity whenever he appears.

"The Sheriff's Mistake" (Nestor).—Here is a Western picture that touches the heart. It tells the story of an unfortunate man out of work his money gone, and wrongfully accused of robbery. He makes a dash for liberty, but is badly wounded in the flight. The sheriff posts his men about the house to starve him out. They relent when his wife and little one appear to get water. At this juncture the sheriff dashes up with the tidings that the real thief has confessed, and the unfortunate man is exonerated. A purse is made up, and Tom gets work. The Nestor photography, which by some witchery makes the figures appear almost alive, is responsible for much of the attraction of this picture.

"The Plan that Failed" (Nestor).—Here is a bright bit of comedy. Two young men are positive that a certain girl loves them. A third, a masked individual, loves her, but is not quite so positive about her liking for him. He thinks out a scheme to decide it. He is quite as surprised as the other two, but rises to the occasion and bears her triumphantly away. The feature of this is the unexpected denouement. It is good comedy, and no manager will make a mistake by including it on his list.

"A Music Hall Romance" (Powers).—This is a story of music-hall life. Its heroine is helped to get a musical education by a man who afterwards becomes bankrupt. She finds him serving as a waiter and takes him home. It isn't convincing as played.

"A Pair of Pants" (Reliance).—The only fun in this picture is the possible embarrassment that would follow if incidents such as are pictured really happened. It is vulgar.

"The New Congressman" (Yankee).—This comedy shows how a committee of Western ranchers was received by the Texas Congressman in Washington. The reception, with the boys in dress suits, and with linen bosoms with no shirts attached, and all with guns, including the host, is very funny, but hardly convincing.

"The Twins" (Rex).—This is a very good picture; it interests deeply. Two twins are orphans and are adopted, the one by a good woman who is poor, the other by a woman of culture and refinement and wealth. The inheritance of both is remarkably the same. The environment, after a number of years, seems to have made of one, the poor girl, a fine character, and of the other, who has been pampered by money, a peevish and headstrong girl. One hardly suspects that the same actress is playing both parts. There is nothing in the picture that is more unreasonable than are incidents in some of Shakespeare's plays; but it has a few faults. The chief of these seems to be the unnaturalness of one girl's being restrained from going to her foster mother. The automobile accident is a "made up" scene, but it made a woman in the audience scream when it happened.

"Flames and Fortune" (Thanhouser).—This is mostly little Maria Eline's picture, and she makes it a very charming one. The main scene is in the Southern mansion during the war, and we see the old darky who buries the family fortune to save it, shot by a stray bullet. Then we see the home many years later when it is dilapidated and the two sisters are in want. The burning of the house is what reveals the hidden fortune. Little Maria Eline plays the youngster's part in big sister's love story. The picture is well made and well acted.

"The Desert's Lure" (Bison).—This is a fairly interesting picture with a cattle ranch country and the white desert as background. The relationship of the characters is not very clearly defined at first, and though the main story is clear, it is not wholly convincng.

"The Rights of Age" (Itala).—A middle-aged fiancé, when he sees that the young lady to whom he is engaged has fallen in love with another, has the right, it seems, to ask the lady's father for her hand in behalf of the other. It's a story of European etiquette. The party of tourists, a girl, her father and her middle-aged fiancé, seem to be visiting the Alps, when the girl meets an artist of about her own age and they fall in love. It is fairly well acted and interesting.

"A Piece of String" (Imp).—There is much truth in this story, but it is overdrawn. A youth of the village is accused of stealing a pocket-book which the owner's dog carried off. Of course there's no proof, but every one in the village believes he did take it. What he really picked up was the piece of string which is cleverly utilized to keep the story coherent. One feels that it was a mistake to have the man's own mother believe he took the pocket-book; it argues badly for the man's past reputation and, while it seems to give a more tragic situation, lessens our interest in the man and therefore in the story. Such an incident would probably have divided village opinion strongly, and a nice church scrap would perhaps have followed the minister's sermon on the matter. If the picture could have had, say, Little Mary, as the man's fiancé and she had shown that she half-believed the testimony against him, we might have had a parting scene and a reconciliation scene, even more worth while. One cannot help feeling that the Imp people lost a big opportunity in this picture.

"The Bashful Son" (Reliance).—This is an exquisitely pictured society comedy. The son is so bashful that his father proposes and is accepted. It is very well acted and very amusing.

"The Ingenious Accident" (Eclair).—The accident doesn't seem so ingenious; in fact, it seems to be the weakest part of the picture. The story is a romantic comedy; some of it is very amusing and nearly all of it is interesting. The background is Alpine scenery. The chief characters are a girl, her father, and two lovers, one of whom makes a fake rescue and discredits his rival. Eclair players can be depended upon to act well, and their work in this picture is good. The film is commendable, but not important.

"Tommy Gets a Trumpet" (Eclair).—This is a breezy comedy, with amusing situations brought about by Tommy's trumpet, which, when blown, will act like a cyclone and blow away everything movable in front of it. It's a fairy tale film, and as such commendable.

"Sun Bonnet Sue" (Yankee).—This romantic story of the South of today is not up to the Yankee standard, but it is fairly interesting. Sue herself is charming. The aunty seemed more conscious of her corn-cob pipe than she was in a former picture of these types, but her acting seemed very true until the last scene, where her treatment of the cigarette is unconvincing. The characterization of the surveyor is the most consistent and praiseworthy picture in the film. The ending of the story is pleasant.

"All for a Big Order" (Imp).—This is a very laughable comedy. It is capably conducted and vividly characterized, at least by the leading man, whose acting produces most of the laughs. It is a very commendable film. It is very funny.

"Bill Loses His Mother-in-Law" (Lux).—A farce comedy, reproducing the difficulties of poor little Bill after he loses his mother-in-law when crossing the street. He has a number of unpleasant experiences while engaged in the search. He offers a reward, and a disreputable looking tramp brings her back. Then Bill gets "his" from his wife and the one who was lost.

"He Went for a Rest" (Lux).—This short comedy, presents the difficulties of a young man called home from Paris to the farm on pain of disinheritance. After one day's experience he goes back to Paris, preferring to be cut off rather than to submit to the tasks imposed.

"Molly Pitcher" (Champion).—Here is a film givng in some detail the life history of Molly Pitcher, who became a water-carrier in the Revolutionary army and thus earned the sobriquet which has become historic. The love story with which the film opens scarcely adds to the interest of this famous character. That she took her husband's place at the gun at Monmouth is now questioned, but that doesn't injure the interest of the film. Neither does it prevent the erection of monuments to her memory. Her love affairs close with her marriage to her first lover after the war is over. The feature of the film is Molly. The reproduction of this episode in history is highly commendable, even though rather than much of it is devoted to the relation of love matters which have no bearing upon the principal idea of the film. In this instance the public is more interested in Molly alone.

"The Broncho Buster's Ride" (American).—Here is a lively story of cowboy life, presenting a fresh phase of what they would do under certain conditions. The foreman's wife refuses to work and compels him to do house work. The boys get sick of it, kidnap the wife and take her to a lone canyon. There they compel her to work. The foreman finds them and the wife is so overjoyed at being rescued that she becomes a model housewife ever after. The foreman thanks the bunch for their disinterested work in his behalf.

"The Yiddisher Cowboy" (American).—Here is a lively comedy showing how a Yiddisher cowboy, compelled by the other boys to do stunts for their amusement, turned the tables on them after a time and forced them to perform a dance which was quite as picturesque as his. The American players have put a great deal of vim and appreciation of the characters represented into this film and it will be certain to please.

"How Women Win" (Powers).—This is an amusing suffragette picture and tells how women get ahead of men—it is by tickling their vanity. There is a picture of the recent "Votes for Women" laides' parade in New York City in it, which is interesting. The story is farcical but very lively and mirth-giving.

"A Spring Tragedy" (Powers).—This slight anecdote story is on the same reel with the above. The girl thought it was a man who snatched the daisy covered spring hat from her head; but the end proved that "Bossy" had reached her nose over. Bossy is led into the picture still chewing the hat. It is amusing.

"The Coffin Ship" (Thanhouser).—One seldom sees on the films a better story than this might easily have been. It has a tensely dramatic situation. The daughter of the miserly owner of "the coffin ship" has secretly married its captain and has stowed-away in order to be with him. When her father gets her note he is despair; but this is not represented with very telling power. The worst faults of the film are in the conduct of the wreck and rescue episodes. The waterlogged ship just before the raft is launched is too plainly aground; there is no suggestion of danger. The story didn't need that scene at all. The raft would hardly have kept the captain and his wife afloat on the sea for an hour; and it might easily have been larger. The ship which rescued them didn't seem to be afloat, nor was it necessary for the film to picture it. The story is an old one and as such will be likely to be received more critically than would a new story. Yet as it is, it is very interesting and will be acceptable.

"The Dude Cowboy" (Bison).—None of the Bison comedies can be called dull, except by comparison. This film pictures some rough horseplay at the Bison ranch, and the whole company seemingly takes part in it. The butt of the fun is an amorous dude who is spending a week there. The Chinaman and the darkey are dressed up in the clothes of two of the girls, and the dude makes love to them. It is not so amusing as other plays by this company.

"Lake Verbano" (Ambrosio).—This exquisite Italian lake in the midst of snowy topped mountains has been shown on the screen before; but the pictures are at a different angle. It's a subject that will bear repetition.

"Tweedledum and His Rescuers" (Ambrosio).—This is a picture of very extravagant doings by the well known comedian. The spectators laughed.

"The Price of Vanity" (Reliance).—This is a very interesting picture, ably conducted and acted. The first few scenes were not very clear, but it is hard to see how they could have been made clearer, except by a sub-title. One scene, where one of the girls of the story comes down a flight of mossy stone steps, is exquisite.

"For Her Sin" (Champion).—This was apparently meant to tell a very tragic story, but it turned out a perhaps unconscious comedy. A scenario writer who could think of such a train of situations with comic intentions might well be proud of himself. The audience began with a titter; at the end it was nearly a roar.

"Evolution of Womankind" (Ambrosio).—The clever actress who took the lead in this sprightly picture thoroughly enjoyed herself. It's a fresh picture of a situation that has been presented before. The wife puts her husband into his proper place as her helpmate; he tends the babies while she is having a jolly good time. This reviewer thoroughly enjoyed the picture and thinks it will be popular. The leading lady does very commendable work in it.

KALEM.

A CATTLE HERDER'S ROMANCE.—David Blair, foreman of the Red River ranch, asks John Darnham, owner of the ranch, for his consent to marry his daughter Rachel. Mr. Darnham refusing, the young lovers decide to elope. Hiding to the nearest settlement they are quickly married, and ride to a small cabin close to the top of a nearby mountain, where the young couple plan to live as brother and sister while waiting for forgiveness from Rachel's father. Allen Ford, a cowboy employed on an adjacent ranch, while traveling over the mountains, becomes lost and meets with injury through a fall. The accident is witnessed by Rachel, who quickly makes her way from the cabin and in works his way to the injured stranger. Finding him apparently badly hurt, Blair throws him over his shoulder and carries him to his temporary home, where he is introduced to Rachel as Blair's sister. As Ford convalesces, he falls in love with his handsome nurse. This causes an unpleasant situation, and as soon as he is able to travel, he is invited to leave. In the meantime the runaway Durham has returned, and offers a reward for information leading to the location of Blair and his daughter. Ford, learning of the advertisement, and thinking that Blair is to be arrested for some crime, out of revenge goes to the nearest town and informs the sheriff of the probable place in the little mountain cabin, offering to lead the way to the couple's retreat. On reaching the mountain top, the sheriff hands Rachel a note reading: "My daughter Rachel has eloped and married my foreman, Harold Blair. I will pay $1,000 reward to any one who will reach and assure them of my pardon, providing they return home to the ranch at once. This note was at present a surprise to the happy couple as it was disappointing to Ford.

THE NEW COOK.—Bertie calls on his sweetheart, Clara. Maid interrupts them and is told maid of all work rather tends to disconcert the ardent swain. Discouraged by Clara's reserve, he makes bold to ask her papa for his consent to their marriage, but is immediately thrown bodily out of the house. Papa later on meets a man in the street who, on receiving, prepares an omelette for breakfast, composed of ancient eggs. Being called to task for his bad cooking, the latter tells the papa is at the newspaper office putting in an advertisement for a new cook. Bertie picks up a copy of the ad which he has dropped, and sees a scheme. Disguising himself in female attire, he applies for the position of cook and lands it. Papa soon begins to take a fancy to the new culinary artist and everything goes swimmingly until the iceman calls. Bertie, not being familiar with the happ ways of the iceman, objects to his taking out a large piece of ice from the cooler and putting in a small piece, so he decides to throw him out. In the struggle Bertie's wig comes off and on the arrival of papa, who has been summoned by the Clara during the fight, the young man is exposed. During the melee the old cook returns and asks to be re-employed. Through the efforts of the pleadings of Clara, papa finally relents and withdraws his opposition to Bertie.

TO THE AID OF STONEWALL JACKSON.—Monday, while the girl spy is visiting relatives, General Sutelda, of the Confederate army, and his staff, take possession of the house for the night. Nan, seeing an opportunity to employ her professional talents, makes an effort to learn the Union soldiers' plans. She finds the General's room guarded, but discovers another way to overhear the conversation. Reporting to her chief on the second floor, she crawls out of the window on to the roof of the garden, lowers herself down to the ground and takes up a position at the window of the General's room. Hearing the officer say he would attack Jackson's ragbread, Nan slips away unobserved. General and his Confederate army one hundred miles away. Starting on her journey, Nan rides at top speed with her important information.

Tuesday night, Nan has twenty miles more to go and her horse is fagged out. She forces her to rest at a nearby town, where she unwittingly runs into danger and is suspected of being the girl spy. The loyal keeper of the tavern warns one of the suspicion aroused against her and an hour later Nan escapes from her room, goes to the barn for her horse, which she mounts and rides off. As she passes the tavern door the Union soldiers, hearing the sound of her horse, all rush out and readily recognize the spy is trying to escape. They quickly mount their horses and follow in pursuit. Nan, however, being thoroughly familiar with the country, fools them. Finally reaching the Confederate lines, she asks that she be taken to General Jackson, whom she informs that Shields will march at sunrise Wednesday morning and before noon will attack Jackson's flank. The doughty General of the Confederates replies, "We will march immediately and surprise General Shield's rear."

PATHE.

THE SUBLIME PARDON.—Lieut. Mason and his wife lived very happily together in their summer home. Mason is on shore leave, and everything is serene and lovely, until one day Mrs. Mason receives a letter from her cousin stating that, her mother having died, she is now utterly alone in the world. Out of the kindness of their hearts the Masons take her in and give her a home. The cousin, however, soon attracts the attention of the Lieutenant, and finally the inevitable happens. Mason and his wife's cousin elope and Mrs. Mason gets a divorce. Five years pass and Mason is seen in his second home, to which a little child has come to make them happy. Soon after the Mason is ordered to Africa for active service. At home, remorse is eating at the heart of his wife, who is far from happy, and she, finally, decides to leave her cousin, begging her to come and grant her forgiveness. Before the latter arrives Mason dies, and, finding her cousin on her death bed, he endows her great wrong she had done her. Mason, on hearing of his wife's death through a letter belonging to his child, finds his first wife in the role of mother to his daughter, and in a most dramatic scene the two are reconciled.

THE STEPSISTERS.—Mr. Martin and his daughter are alone in the garden when Mr. Martin announces to his child that he is going to marry again, and that he hopes her new mother and her daughters will find a warm spot in her heart. The motherless girl promises to do her best to make the newcomers happy, and about a week later, when the new arrival, Mrs. Wardwell, does her best to accomplish it, but from the outset she is repulsed by the haughty woman and her proud daughter, who have evidently come for the purpose of reckoning coming, however. Young Wardwell, a wealthy young bachelor in the neighborhood, has called a number of times, and has fallen deeply in the daughter is deeply in love with him. Wardwell, however, is the favorite of the stepmother and stepsister with their just deserts.

THE PASSING OF THE TRAPPER.—Dappled Fawn is the daughter of the chief of her tribe and is deeply in love with a young brave, but her affection is not returned and the chief, her father, gives her to a trapper in exchange for many gifts. Heartbroken and unable to refuse her father's bidding, Dappled Fawn leaves with the trapper and they ride away from the camp towards her new home. The trapper, however, is not to be thwarted thus easily. Taking a horse from camp, he follows the unhappy girl. Ere long he catches her up and a fierce struggle ensues, a spectacular fight on horseback between the trapper and the Indian. At the end the trapper overcomes his adversary and deals him a deadly blow. Poor little Dappled Fawn is now indeed alone in the world, and the persistent love of the trapper has grown more and more distasteful, until finally she decides to get out of it and join her lover in the Happy Hunting Ground. She, therefore, throws herself from a cliff into the swirling water of a mountain stream. THE WATER BEETLE AND ITS YOUNG.—This is a most fascinating picture, and shows the life of the ordinary black water beetle, or diver, from its infancy to maturity. The sub-titles in this film are very comprehensive, and altogether the picture is most interesting and instructive.

In an engagement with the British George is wounded and drags himself home to die in his mother's arms. After burying him little Charles decides to be avenged, and stealing from home with his brother's long rifle, he follows the trail left by the army, and finally sighting the British, he climbs a tree and from its topmost branches picks off man after man in the British camp, until the Redcoats finally discover their assailant and fire a volley into the tree top. Charles falls wounded to the ground, where he is found and carried home by his mother, who has been searching for him. An officer and several men from the British army follow the trail of blood left by the little hero, and finding him dead in his mother's home, mock the grief-stricken woman, and order her to fetch them water to drink. Tom, the youngest, is brought home one night by a policeman after having been arrested for stealing a woman's purse. His mother, after punishing him severely, locks him in his room, from which he escapes by the window, after leaving a note that he intends running away to return. Years after the mother dies after extracting a promise from her older son, Jim, now a middle-aged man, to look for and care for the lost boy. Jim goes West and becomes the sheriff of a Western town. After a more or less strenuous career as sheriff, Jim is on the trail of the sheriff is called to the depredations of an unknown outlaw, who, through his daring has spread terror in the county. The outlaw is perhaps a large reward for the outlaw's capture, in various parts of the country, but Jim continues in pursuit of the outlaw's plot to hold up the stage the next day that the sheriff feels he will at last make someone the object of his search. The next day holdup is stalled off and the outlaw pursued. He, however, eludes them and hurrying to his shack, waits with loaded rifle for the pursuing posse of Jim, leaving the posse, takes up the trail alone on foot, leaving word that if he fires his revolver for them to hurry to the shack. As he nears the shack sheriff takes the bad man unawares, but upon seeing his face, realizes that he has found his long lost brother. The younger man also recognizes his brother and refusing to run away, begs Jim to arrest him. Jim pleads with the outlaw to make good his escape, but Tom steadfastly refuses, and finally, rather than to place the sheriff in a bad light, gives himself up and returns with them. The posse burst into the room at that moment and are surprised to find the sheriff weeping over the dead body of the bad man.

BIOGRAPH.

HER SACRIFICE.—The young son of a wealthy Mexican house returns home from school. He is the only son of a widowed mother, whose heart beats only for him. He becomes fascinated by a pretty but low barmaid, who really returns his love, he being the first person she has truly loved. The mother finding the efforts to break his attachment for the girl futile, appeals to her, swearing that by such an alliance the boy would lose his name, his high honor, trying to prove that if she really loves him she will give him up. The girl realizes the situation, and swears to do so for mother wishes, and so pretends a deception with an old-time suitor. It has its effect, for the young man goes away disgusted, but almost heartbroken. No sooner has he gone than she casts aside this lover with repulsion. This man sees that her heart is the young man's alone and goes after him with sinister mien. She, fearing for this lovers' mad jealousy, follows, and as he fires thrown herself between the two, receiving the fatal shot. Her only recompense was her dying to his arms, he now knowing the extent of her love for him.

FIGHTING BLOOD.—An old soldier on the frontier, the father of a dozen children, a staunch patriot himself, brings these children up with rigid military training. He conducts his household as a garrison with strict discipline, drills, etc. On the evening of the day the picture opens, the oldest boy wishes to go out to make a call on his sweetheart, but the old soldier commands the boy to stay at home. This command the boy is loath to obey, but his father, himself brought up under rigid military rule, rails at his insubordination of the boy, and threatens that if the boy goes out he goes for good. The boy does go, however, and returning finds sure enough the door barred against him. Sad and homeless he wanders, but it is fortunate he does for the next morning he views from a distance a tribe of Indians starting out on the war-path. With this lead, he with valient effort, secures the aid of a troop of patrolling soldiers, who rescue the boy's family and sweetheart just in time. The military training imbued by the old soldier stood in good, as it was the means of holding the Indians at bay until help arrived.

RESCUED IN TIME.—The widow was extremely fair to look upon. Harry and Jack were extremely in love with her, though their characters were widely different. Each tried to keep the other from getting an advantage.

One day, Harry slipped in from the range, and proposed to the widow. That fair lady promptly rejected him. A short time afterward, Jack called. Did the lady reject Jack? Not much.

A couple of days later, at the post office, "Bright Eyes," a young Indian girl, was insulted by Harry. The widow and Jack appeared on the scene and the widow interfered between Harry and the Indian girl. Harry then transferred his attentions to the widow, whereupon Jack knocked him down, and real live gun play was averted only by the appearance of several cowboys, who separated them.

One day the widow and her little boy were out rowing on the river with Jack. They landed to take a walk through the woods, leaving the child sitting in the boat. Harry appeared at this point, and true to his nature, sought to get revenge by pushing the boat off and letting it drift towards the rapids. When the lovers returned from their walk, the widow was almost driven to distraction, by the disappearance of her little boy.

In the meantime, Mary Lamson, a settler's daughter, saw the boat drifting down the river. She was an excellent swimmer, and promptly dived in and swam to the boat, where she was amazed to find the ones missing. Without them, she was helpless against the swift current, that was rapidly bearing them to destruction.

From this predicament, they were rescued by some Indians, who saw them from the shore. But they were not friendly Indians, and they made the white child and the girl their prisoners. It so happened, however, that Bright Eyes was a member of this tribe and she recognized the child as belonging to the young widow who had befriended her, so she slipped away, mounted a horse, and rode to the widow's home. Jack was there, and as soon as he heard where the little boy was, he called together the cowboys and started off to the rescue. The Indians saw them coming and tried to make their escape, but the cowboys overtook them, and after a battle, rescued the girl and child.

The treacherous action of the disappointed lover, Harry, was discovered later, and he was driven from the ranch by the enraged cowboys. Jack and the widow, of course, were happily married.

THE LITTLE REBEL.—A detachment of Union Soldiers called at Southern mansion, which were using as their temporary headquarters. The house was occupied by Miss Rosalind and her daughter Rosalind, the women-folk having been attached to the cause of the South, and although they were away, they fiercely resented the intrusion of the Northern detachment.

Among the Union officers, was a young lieutenant who immediately fell in love with the beautiful Southern girl. Of course Rosalind did not love him, and in every action she showed that she hated him very greatly as well as scorned him.

It happened one day that the officers were about to go into the sitting room and discuss campaign plans. Rosalind slipped in ahead of them and hid under a table. There she remained and overheard the plans, which it was so important should be kept secret. After the officers had gone away, she came from her hiding place. And as she did so, the young lieutenant came back and saw her. Duty compelled him to present her leaving the house, but Rosalind was desperate with patriotic resolve. She drew a revolver from her pocket and shot him. Then she quickly mounted a horse and galloped off to tell the enemy what she had heard of the Union officers' plans. Two soldiers were ordered to pursue her and bring her back, which they did. Then the captain in charge of the detachment questioned her. She refused to tell why she was running away or why she had shot the Lieutenant. The captain threatened punishment and was about to deal with her with military severity, when the lieutenant, who lived her, said, "She had a perfect right to shoot me." On hearing this, the other officers turned their backs on the lieutenant and apologized to Rosalind. Thus the lieutenant saved her from punishment and perhaps from death.

A short time afterward the officers left the house. Before they left, they had learned from the old mammy servant. When he took out his watch and looked at what to the others, where he was concealed in quite a different manner by Rosalind. Absence had made her heart grow fonder, and remembered the other actions, and eventually became his wife.

FOXY IZZY.—Izzy Horowitz, a good natured Jewish gentleman, had a pair of suspenders to a retired gentleman. When he took out his watch and looked at what to the others, where he was concealed in quite a different manner by Rosalind. Absence had made her heart grow fonder, and remembered the other actions, and eventually became his wife.

Izzy's business here along the railroad track. When Izzy says there he started to run, but he was interested by his stock in trade and the tramps soon caught him.

At the point of their revolver they took away his stock, the bag of money and even his coat. Then they disappeared into the woods.

When they were counting their plunder, Izzy appeared upon the scene. The tramps threatened to kill him, but Izzy said he didn't mind any of the things they had taken except the money he received for his suspenders. Izzy then exhibited a watch. To make them believe one another, Izzy kindly showed some tricks in the watch's card line.

The tramps were a very simple set and fixed five shots through Izzy's pockets. Next he saw through the hat, and then "Well dis is accommodate you, but we leave you your watch," said the tramps. "Dat I'll accommodate you," said Izzy, and, so saying, he made a switch assault upon them, punching, kicking and wrestling with them until the tramps were finally laid "dare ob outdoor" by the athletic peddler.

Izzy then counted his money, gathered up his goods, put his coat on, adjusted the ties and departed having come out on the real winner by one nickel-plated watch. Which he appropriated in payment for his trouble.

HIS BIRTHDAY.—John Grant was a middle-aged business man with a loving and beautiful wife, one morning he left home without some valuable papers needed in business. His wife brought them to the office and Grant asked her to take them a very unnecessary proceeding, as we noted.

Here Lawrence Wilson took charge of Mrs. Grant and she assumed the duties of stenographer, as a surprise to the rest, she attended the services of Grant's birthday dinner given by the employees and presented him the watch and his wife whom he did not see. It is known, and he was overjoyed at the surprise as she thought that she would be found with the other board was success to him. Grant's wife was a very loving wife, and all the household to enter that one might marry the one we met there.

The Vim Comedy Co. at the same time Rosemont issued what we assumed at the office was the last and finest of all reflections. The wife and husband were the central figures and were surrounded by some good and some beautiful characters. There he understood the meaning for all the worthless belongings here and the same and he realized as never before that in the last analysis all are the same.

on the ranch was because Jack, the young foreman was patient with him. One day, Dorothy, the ranchman's daughter, went for a ride on her favorite pony. Bill followed her and tried to make love to her. She resented his attentions and he in revenge cut the saddle girth so that Dorothy fell and was stunned.

When her horse appeared at the ranch Jack excitedly called the cowboys together and galloped off in search of her. They found her and also the saddle, and Jack accused Bill of cutting the girth. He advised Bill to get out before the boys strung him up, but Bill was already partly intoxicated and refused to go. Later on he interrupted the barn dance and finally at the bar he challenged Jack to a fight.

Fourteen rounds they exchanged revolver shots. Suddenly Jack saw Bill fall. On going to him he found that he had been bitten by a venomous snake. Jack shot the snake.

Just at that moment the others came running up. He looked very much as though Jack had shot Bill and hurriedly was in despair at the possibility of being arrested by the young foreman. But Jack showed them the body of the snake and explained the whole thing.

Dorothy was so glad that about the man that [illegible] and the cowboys gave a loud cheer for the popular foreman and his beautiful bride.

THE REPORTER.—The editor of the "Rising Sun," angry at a story of a rival paper, instructs his reporter to write up "How it Feels to be a Burglar." The reporter, in despair, accepts dark lantern, etc.

Finding a ladder which some painters had left in front of a house, the reporter concludes that his chance has come—climbs the ladder and enters the window. The room he enters is in semi-darkness and in his excitement he knocks over a chair. After recovering from his fright he seeks for a suitable article to take with him and concludes that the portfolios will do. He lights a match, and in the dare sees the face of a statute on a pedestal in front of him which puts him in a terrible panic. He backs into piano, pulling statute down, which falls crashing to the floor. The noise awakens Mr. and Mrs. Snow, he escaping down stairs, and also calling the police, but Snow's troubles had just begun, as Jones was on the job and finally succeeds in locking the frightened Snow up in a cabinet and escapes through the window just as the police enter the scene, and as a natural consequence, and for the good of the service, some one had to be arrested, so they take Snow, and the honor of the department is saved.

SCENES FROM OUR NAVY.—Showing an assemblage of the great Dogs of War, preparatory and to spectacular manoeuvres, a subject that should be of absorbing interest to any American citizen whose heart palpitates with the resounding strains of "My Country 'Tis of Thee."

A SACRIFICE TO CIVILIZATION.—At the beginning an Indian father and son are shown walking along quiet by level before the village at the Pottawatomie Banding, California, at the foot of San Gorgonio, and they laugh and talk in a manner quite as human as their white brethren. The boy, Armenio Morongo, attends the small reservation school, and a tourist lady and gentleman, childless and young in their middle age, are attracted to him by his brightness and vivacity.

They apply to his teacher to help them gain his father's consent to his adoption, and old Cahuilla is finally made to realize the vast advantage to his boy, and sadly gives him up. Little Armenio is taken to St. Louis and entered in a school. He tries his best, and is brave and good natured, but as winter comes on, the child, unused to snow and the rigors of a northern climate, falls ill and writes his father a brave, pathetic little letter.

Cahuilla, on receipt of the letter, hurries to his boy, taking advantage of the old time Indian privilege of riding free on freight trains. He is confused in the whirl of the great city's streets, but through the kindness of a good natured policeman, reaches the house in time to have his boy die in his arms.

THE NEW EDITOR.—"Dick" Roberts, a young newspaper reporter, out of a job, becomes assistant editor to Silas P. Bunker, owner of the Mayville "Clarion." In a novel comedy incident, Dick meets Clarabel Busey, and the young people promptly fall in love with each other. Clarabel's mother is the president of the "Women's Suffrage Club of Mayville," and the leader of the ladies in a fight for town ownership of the water works against the water company.

President Perkins of the water company, has just had a consultation with Roman, the local political boss, and the two have drafted a compromising letter to their state Senator, demanding his support and the defeat in the legislature of the town ownership water works bill.

The two men leave the room, and Mrs. Busey enters to plead her cause with Perkins. She writes on the back of the compromising letter some notes for her speech, and then leaves, after a stormy talk with Perkins.

When Perkins discovers the loss of the letter, he bribes the editor of the "Clarion" to keep all Suffragette items out of his paper.

Then Roman gets some loafers to break up the "Women's Suffrage Meeting." The women storm the "Clarion" office, when the editor refuses to print their statements.

Then Mrs. Busey buys the "Clarion" and makes Dick editor. Dick finds Perkin's compromising letter among the sheets of Mrs. Busey's speech, and despite the desertion of his compositor and printer, he gets out an extra edition, exposing the water company gang.

THE HONOR OF THE FLAG.—Mary lived with her mother at the XX ranch, which was on the Rio Grande, just across from Mexico, and, as there was a ford there, it was easy for persons to cross from either side. One day, while riding on the Mexican side, she heard screams of distress and came upon Juanita, a beautiful Mexican girl, who had been insulted by Jose, a bad man of that vicinity, who commanded a band of guerillas, who plundered and stole under the guise of insurrectos.

Mary interfered and ordered Jose away, but the guerilla was determined to possess Juanita, and next day crossed to the XX ranch, where she had taken refuge, and demanded her.

Mary and her mother had just returned from a visit to the camp of the American troops, then patrolling the border, where they had witnessed the manoeuvres and a friendly officer had instructed Mary in the wig-wag signals for communication. They were not inclined to deliver the girl to Jose and told him so, also firing the "Stars and Stripes," which he tried to tear down. Mary's wrath rose high, and ordered him off the place at the point of her revolver.

Jose returned in his own and they attacked the ranch house, which was ably defended by the three women. Finally it looked as though numbers must prevail, so Mary mounted the roof and with a handkerchief tied to a cane, she "wig-wagged" the American camp for help.

An officer, with a squad of Uncle Sam's boys soon responded. The guerillas were forced to abandon the flag, which they had insulted and were late the flag, which they had insulted and were late the flag, which they had insulted and were late thereby escaping. His deeds of heroism place him in line for promotion, and newspaper accounts of them are read to Edna.

Tom is granted sick leave and returns to America. Before doing so he apprises Edna of the fact by letter. Just as the postman is delivering the letter, he accidentally drops the mail, and recognizes Tom's handwriting. He gives Edna the balance of the mail, but accidentally drops the envelope to Tom's letter. While Edna is out of the room Jack conceals himself by waving the flag in front of Jessie's dog. She catches him doing this, and is greatly indignant. She returns Tom's engagement ring and orders him from the house forever.

Just at this juncture, Tom appears. He makes Jack complete and the film ends with the American flag gracefully encircling Tom and Edna.

THE LATENT SPARK.—Bill Jones is a tramp. He makes application for a position at a residence. The housewife gives him a job of sawing wood. He accepts the position, but as soon as she has gone indoors he lays himself to her husband's clothes that have been hanging on the line. He gets away, but is followed by a large crowd. However Bill manages to get on board a steamer. On the voyage Bill is discovered and is now made to do scrub duty. Next stop at China, and Bill is greatly admired. One day while cantering down one of the streets in China, Bill notes some Chinese seating the Stars and Stripes. He interferes and is studied. One of his shipmates discovers his lifeless body and brings him on board the ship. While the crew are mourning his loss, Bill nonchalantly assumes a sitting posture. Everybody is overjoyed and showers congratulations upon him.

IN NORTHERN FORESTS.—Phil has redeeming qualities, one in particular, his love for children. This is very easily seen where the poor fellow in a railroad coach is being taken handcuffed to prison. In the seat next to the one in which he is sitting there is a little child, Dotty.

The train stops, the sheriff, with his prisoner, leaves the car, and we don't see the convicted man again, until we see him in stripes, working in the prison shoeshop, and witness his escape from the prison window, when he makes his plunge into the river and his long swim to freedom. The alarm is sounded and soon a sheriff's posse of hardy riders are on the trail of the escaped prisoner.

Dotty, the little girl whom we met on the same train with the prisoner, starts out from her home to roam the fields. She becomes lonesome. It is night. The child sees the man sleeping quietly and she accosses him. After recovering from his fright, Phil hugs the child to his bosom and pillows her head upon his breast and soon she is asleep. Out of the stillness the howls of wolves are heard. The man clasps the child to his breast and makes a dash for safety. The wolves are coming nearer and nearer. In order to escape he lights matches which the child clings to his back. Soon the wolves surround the tree and make frantic efforts to reach Phil and the child. The sheriff and his men, find their man tenderly holding little Dotty in his arms, perched on the limb of a tree like patience on a monument.

One of the horsemen takes the child, the prisoner is handcuffed and lifted in front of another rider and the entire cavalcade moves toward the town, where it is met by the anxious parents of the child and the joyous shouts of neighbors. When they are told how the child was saved from the wolves, their gratitude can only be expressed by the warmest and sincerest good will, and the kiss which the little child places upon his brow as he starts with his captors to his prison cell, with a promise of all known people to petition the governor for his pardon.

THE WOES OF A WEALTHY WIDOW.—Pathé's injunction, "Smile," is exemplified in the widow and could not be better illustrated than it is in this picture. "Bunny" is very much in love with her for her vast money, but the trouble is she is not very handsome, although very conceited and very affectionate, even "spoon-fonny" as the saying is. Her little Fido also likes her, bringing one of his friends with him, to whom he has given an account of her wealth and his good fortune in sounding so rich a relation. Bunny's friend makes himself very agreeable and lays siege to the widow's heart, at least she falls for his winning ways, throws off her old love and takes on the new, but it is not long before she discovers that he is already married and her hopes are blasted.

Her next sanitor is a musical Italian count, who sings a love song and has the manners of a bear. He is very fond of spaghetti and she caters to his taste by preparing a dish of the stringy stems, which he eats like a cow knocking a bunch of hay, spills it all over himself and so disgusts her she tells the maid she makes him "sick Spanish" from his repast.

Her fourth admirer is a lawyer whom she consults concerning an investment of $200,000 that sounds good to the man of legal mind and he not only goes about to find a suitable investment for her, but at the same time tries to make himself the custodian of her fortune and her tender little heart. She is willing until she learns that her legal wooing has taken half-a-dozen years, and are untimely and ridiculous beyond human endurance. She resolves on dropping the lawyer and once more being she is fancy free. She next forms to her first love, her dear old "Bunny," for whom she longs and impatiently waits his coming. Unable to stand the strain any longer, she goes out to take a walk, hoping she will meet him, which she does, on her front door-step. He assumes more or less displeasure at the treatment which she has shown him, but soon all is forgiven and once more they fondle one their undying love and formulate plans for future bliss and happiness.

SNOW BOUND WITH A WOMAN HATER.—Surrounded by the hills and forests of the Adirondacks, Sam Hillyar, a woman hater, lives with his servant in a well equipped mountain lodge.

Winter has covered everything with a heavy layer of snow, which is still falling. Miss Mary Wright, who has been invited to spend the week end with her friend, who lives in a neighboring bungalow, misses the train upon which she is expected to arrive. Later, when she reaches the lonely little railroad station, no one is there to meet her, so she starts out to walk to her friend's house. She struggles through the deep snow in the midst of the blinding storm, until she is almost exhausted. She sees Sam Hillyar's house in the distance, pushes on in the hope of reaching it before darkness sets in and ask for shelter for the night. Sam Hillyar and his valet at the door and her summons is answered by the old servant, who admits her and notifies his master. Sam reluctantly consents to accept the woman, to stay under his roof. Her reception is a cold one and she is of necessity obliged to accept his hospitality. She is shown to a room, and in spite of women's clothes, she is frustrated by a suit of pajamas and a pair of slippers that she is served with refreshments and retires for the night.

The next morning after a good night's sleep and dressing, she feels like her old self full of buoyancy and self possession. She goes down stairs to the dining room where Sam Hillyar's breakfast is awaiting him; she deliberately sits down at the table and eats his toast, while Sam looks on dumbfounded. The servant is passing through the room with a tray full of breakfast, which he is taking to Mary's room, but she is glad to find out it is she is quite entitled with the meant of added, she is partaking. Her motherly, rather pantheon and interests in the absence of the house and his master becomes a little more pronounced. The case of an aged woman dependent upon his finger Mary's sympathetic and feels pleases the master and summons the cook time to his table. At once motherly Mary thoroughly at home by assuming the reins for the time and other deliberate. Sam Hillyar looks on in wonderment at the transformation that has been wrought in the right sort, and he immediately compliments her and incidentally tells her he thinks she is all right and upon leave for the afternoon and embraces the right before. He leaves her to chat to Hillyar and prepares for her safety and for friend's home. She consents to stay if he promises to be real good and not make himself any more.

At noon-time Sam and Mary are seated at the table as if they had known each other all their lives, calling a dachshund a pedigreed hound and getting better acquainted all the time. Hillyar's man announces that the sleigh is ready and Sam dons the garbage by helping Mary on with the wraps and putting on his own furs, soon he is already known by them. They unite in the Christmas dinner with them, he presents her a ring, announces his engagement to Miss Mary, he is pressed to go, that is all, they are married.

VILLAGE GOSSIP—In the little village the only stable's wife lies very ill and the doctor says no strenuous time is to be forced to be away from home almost the entire time, so that the wife is left to the kindly attention of her neighbors.

One day he is forced to spend a few visits from her home and, being a very good looking fellow, he generously offers her a position as servant in his home, which she gladly accepts. She packs away all of her clothes in a small trunk and is soon on the conductor's train, is seen by all the village gossips and the wife of the hotel is quick to discover.

She duly accompanies the little lad to school and then returns to the home and starts in effect the attention of the schoolmaster, who watches her and notes where she is going and under what conditions.

The gossiping tongues of village gossips soon make her life a burden, especially that of the wife of the hotel keeper, and the schoolmaster and the gossiping women. They are finally successful in their efforts and the wife of the hotel keeper, in the absence of the village doctor, is persuaded to speak about the matter, the servant summarily dismissed.

Broken-hearted, she packs her few belongings and in the early morning leaves the village for her good-by and shows no sorrow.

Of course, everyone appreciates the joke but poor Jimmie, but she is forced to let Jimmie try his little trick and as he said the magic [illegible] of sugar produces several others of its kind on the spinster's handbag, and during the laughter of the other guests, she moves wrathfully away, vowing never to visit Jimmie's parents again.

AN OASIS IN THE SAHARA DESERT.—Gabes is an important village of Sud-Tunisia in the Gulf of Gabes. It possesses a very good harbor, which makes an important export of dates, the chief production of the country.

The oases are the special home of the date palm, of which there are about 4,000,000 in the Algerian oases. It is in company with this tree, without which life in the Sahara would be practically impossible, that grow apricots, peaches, oranges, citrons, grapes, figs, pomegranates, etc.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.

THE TAMING OF THE SHREW.—Baptista Minola is the father of Katherine and Bianca. Petruchio is the shrew tamer. Incidentally the accepted lover of the gentle Bianca, and Grumio, the resourceful servitor of Petruchio, who gets his ear pulled more than once for his laggard performance of duty. This Katherine of Shakespeare is a standing sign-mark for parents who permit early indulgence by their girls and who are careless of their education. These two defects in Katherine's early training transformed her into a complete scold, and it was only by confronting a superior will that her irritable disposition was controlled and her natural womanliness restored.

As for Petruchio, he is one of a class of characters almost peculiar to Shakespeare. He is of the same family as Mercutio and Benedick—all forceful, vigorous, outspoken, manly men. Who could have imagined (and, still less, who could have possessed the hardihood and devility to carry out) the plan of attending his wedding ceremonies in such a garb, except a Petruchio?

THE PRICE OF A MAN.—John Braham is discharged by Farmer Jones, and is told to call in the morning for his pay. When he arrives he is horrified at the sight that meets his gaze as he enters the cottage. Farmer Jones is lying dead, with a blood-stained poker at his side. Neighbors enter just at the moment Braham is looking at the poker, and he is accused of the crime. He is fascinated, but manages to escape.

In his flight he stops at the house of a poor widow. He begs for food and is given it. Just then a knock on the door is heard, and he asks the good woman to hide him. She does so, thereby sending him right into the arms of the police. A few minutes after they have gone another knock is heard. She hides him again. This time it is the mortgage holding $500, using a bailiff to arrange with her to levy upon her goods. She is unable to pay it, so he leaves, threatening to foreclose the mortgage.

After the second visitor has left, Braham comes out of his hiding place, and bids the good woman good-bye. While he is walking away he realizes that home is a $500 reward for his capture, and decides to give himself up to some good person who will restore the money to the good widow who fed him, so he gives himself up to the police, and in this way the good woman is able to pay off the obnoxious mortgage. She is overwhelmed with joy and at once starts for the Governor's office to sue for his release. After two necessary proceedings, it is found that Braham is not guilty, and so he is released. It is needless to say he presents to the good widow, who promptly accepts him.

TRADING HIS MOTHER.—Donald is a small boy with a very charming young widow for a mother. His joy in the possession of so fascinating a guardian is somewhat dimmed and ruffled by the desire of older persons to share that possession, or, as it looks to him, to take her from him. He is a jealous and vigilant chaperon in intent, if not in person, and it makes it rather difficult for the young men who would like to make love to the charming little widow.

One of them does succeed in making friends with Donald, except when the mother is near, and it is then that he learns that Donald does not possess a watch and that a watch is one of his great heart desires. This suggests a very brilliant idea to Lawrence, this particular suitor, and when he next appears at the house of the little widow, he brings a pretty boy's watch with him which he offers to Donald. Of course, Donald is delighted, but when he understands that he can only possess the watch on condition that he allow Lawrence to possess his mother, his soul is divided within him. The temptation, however, is too great and he finally agrees to the bargain and the marriage takes place.

While they are gone on their wedding tour, Donald finds that being left alone with a nurse is very lonesome business and he begins to repent sorely of his bargain. Finally, when he can stand it no longer, he sits down at the desk in the big, lonely library and pens very carefully a very businesslike letter to Mr. Lawrence. It reads: "Dear Mr. Lawrence: Please bring mother back and you may have the watch again. It is as good as new. I need her very much. Donald." The effort proved so great an exertion that Donald falls asleep over it and of course, it so happens that the wedding couple are just returning at this time. They come in and find the sleeping boy and the letter and then the little mother sees a way out of the difficulty. She tells Donald that he can keep the watch and have her also and all that is necessary is for him to accept the new papa into the bargain. Donald solemnly, as difficulty had never occurred to the boy before, and being struck with the ingenuinity of the offer, he closes with it at once.

POLISH AND PIE.—Mr. Brown, noticing the worn and scratched condition of his furniture, decides to improve it with a new coat of varnish. He accordingly goes to a paint store and calls for a pint of shellac. To enable him to carry it conveniently the clerk pours it into a whiskey flask. Returning home, Mr. Brown finds his wife entertaining some ladies of the Local Temperance Society. Concealing the bottle of shellac, he takes it for granted that Mr. Brown indulges in intoxicating liquor and leave the house in haughty disdain.

A little later, Brown's maid of all work mistakes the bottle of shellac for brandy and puts a liberal quantity of it into a home-made pie, which she serves for dinner. Returning to the kitchen, she drinks what is left of the bottle. It takes her but a moment to realize that she has swallowed something other than brandy. Screaming at the top of her voice she dashes frantically into the dining room to warn the family, but too late, as the daughter's fiancé and young man, who has already eaten a goodly portion of the pie now thinks he is poisoned and goes into convulsions. The house is in an uproar until Mr. Brown explains that the bottle contained merely a mixture of alcohol and lac, which is not at all fatal. Suffice it to say the maid immediately takes the pledge.

THE CRUCIAL TEST.—Channing was a reporter from the ground up, a writer who could catch the public ear and hold it, but after he had been sent down to Santiago by his paper, he failed to send in the startling news soon enough to suit the people at home. For this there was a good reason, as there was nothing to send in, as it proved to be just that portion of the country visited when the Spanish fleet was laid up in the harbor of Santiago, but it caused the manager of his paper to wire him his discharge and send another man down in his place. Consequently, when the story opens, Channing finds himself stranded in Cuba, without a job and without money.

Keating, the new reporter, arrives and at once falls into the ways of a great many newspaper reporters, who have nothing to do but to wait until something turns up, takes to drinking heavily and becomes careless of what is going on, while each day finds Channing more destitute and more despondent, until he has reached the stage of sleeping on the docks at night, broke, hungry and weak.

By chance he hears Keating arranging to engage a tug to visit the American ent, and, unbeknown to Keating, who is greatly under the influence of liquor, he secures a job on the boat as a deck hand. This was a wonderful piece of luck, for just as the fleet is sighted there is a movement on the deck and the next moment the Battle of Santiago is on.

Channing rushes down to the Captain's stateroom to call Keating, but finds him drunk and almost insensible to what is going on around him. Channing rushes on deck and there beholds the pride of the Spanish war fleet shattered, broken and sunk, while huge black columns of smoke are pouring from the vessels. It is a wonderful sight and the reporter's instinct stirs the heart of him. He writes the story of the victory, succeeds in reaching the telegraph office before anyone else and sends in the whole story, but sends it in the name of the man who would hardly speak to him and who lay dead to all around him in the stupor of drink.

Three months later he wanders into New York, a human derelict drifting on the sea of fate, but eventually he comes into his own and this scene closes a very interesting and thrilling story of the famous naval engagement of Santiago Harbor.

FOR THE QUEEN'S HONOR.—Prince Alberto loves Gilda, the sister of Queen Amalia and his love is returned. He asks the permission of the king to marry Gilda and the ruler gladly grants the request, having a high regard for the prince. Duke Arturo, a villain at heart, of an intriguing nature, loves Queen Amalia and resolves to win her from her husband or compromise her.

Prince Alberto notices the duke holding whispered converse with the queen, and taking the king aside, cautious him in order to keep queen's honor. The king, already suspicious of the attentions of the handsome duke, decides to keep the queen and the duke under espionage.

Through a subterfuge the duke appoints a clandestine meeting with the queen. Her ruler, somewhat suspicious, discovers them and takes in the compromising situation. She leads the queen away and then pleads with the duke to protect her sister with his unwelcome attentions.

The king and the prince, looking through a secret panel, discover the duke and Gilda together. The enraged king demands an explanation and Gilda, with her quick wonder and wit, confesses that she loves the duke and has met him by appointment, to shield her sister. The king's suspicions are not fully allayed, and he commands them to go to the chapel and be married, while the prince is broken-hearted.

The duke and Gilda persist in their statement that they are married, to the grief of the prince and the dismay of the queen. The king, still suspicious, commands them to their bridal chamber and leaves them.

The duke, although a villain at heart, does not attempt to take advantage of the situation, but conducts his wife to her bedroom and hands her the key. She locks herself in and he remains in the outer room during the night.

The next morning the prince meets the duke and challenges him to a duel. The duke refuses to fight, but takes the prince to the altar of the chapel and, after swearing him to secrecy, divulges the story, leaving the prince and Gilda in front of the altar engaged in prayer.

The duke and the king engage in a friendly fencing bout, but while the attention of the king is directed elsewhere, the duke removes the button from the king's foil, replacing the point of the weapon and leaves it where the king may pick it up without knowing it has been tampered with. When the king returns to renew the fencing engage at arms he touches the duke and he is killed by the deadly poison.

Thus ends the story, with the king in ignorance of the true situation, having killed the man who tried to betray him, the queen relieved from an embarrassing situation, and the lovers free to marry, the king the only one of the principals who never knew.

IN THE SULTAN'S GARDEN.—Lieutenant Robbins, a young naval officer, sees Haydee the favored lotusle of the sultan's harem and is smitten by her charms. She is interested in the handsome young American. She manages to write him a note that is delivered to him on the deck of his warship lying at anchor in a harbor on the Bosphorus Sea. Having inspired him to effect her rescue, as the life is hideous. The adventurous young lieutenant enters into the task with a zest that is commendable and the attempt is fraught with disaster.

Haydee is the favorite of the sultan, the most beautiful of the coterie of pretty women, and a close espionage is kept over her movements. She sees Lieutenant Robbins over the wall of the garden and they have a clandestine meeting. The sultan's spies discover the tryst and the enamored young man is captured, confined in a dungeon and sentenced to be executed at daybreak. Haydee is incarcerated and the sultan is so enraged that she should have a secret love affair, he commands that she be sewed up in a gunny sack and cast into the sea, to suffer death by drowning. The girl is in despair and her power is frantic.

A woman in the harem, who is fond of Haydee, sets her wits to work and when the girl is placed in the bag, manages to secrete a knife in the sack. The girl is thrown into the sea, cuts her bonds and frees herself, swimming to the ship. Once aboard, she startles the commander and the jackies with her story. She is saved for and the relief expedition organized. The Americans, having no love for the sultan and his troops, make a dash for the grounds and Lieutenant Robbins is liberated after a brief but one-sided struggle, in which the sultan's subjects are decimated. In effect the escape of their superior officer. They barely have time to reach the water when the sultan's men are reinforced and for a time the tide of battle seems to be against them.

Boats are put off from the warship and there is an exciting marine engagement. Guns on the war vessel are trained on the scene and the gunnery is excellent. The sultan's men draw off and Lieutenant Robbins and his rescuees reach the ship unharmed, excited but jubilant. The love scene of the young naval officer and his oriental sweetheart on the deck of the vessel is a pretty one and his brother officers envy him his adventure and its attendant result.

THE ACTRESS AND THE COWBOYS.—Mr. and Mrs. Richards, traveling in stock in the West, are stranded in Bowie, Texas. After a thousand miles from home, they have but a few dollars between themselves and starvation. After a conference at the depot, they decide to sell the stage jewelry of Mrs. Richards, and Mr. Richards, going up the street, advertises to sell "the bangles," etc., to the cowboys. They laugh and shout in derision, and cause him to dance to the music of their guns.

It is up to the "actor people" to find a job, and Mr. Richards gets a work upon a truck farm and learns to feed the pigs. Mrs. Richards is more fortunate, and obtains a job feeding cowboys. She is a waitress, she is an inquisitive lass, and the cowboys all fall in love with her. Desiring to give her a token of their regard, they hunt up the farm where the pig and Richards are and purchase his stock of jewelry. They return to the fair charmer in the restaurant, presenting their gifts, and that is the also made happy when she requests them to meet her at the depot in an hour. Hurrying to the depot she finds her husband and shows him the jewelry given her by her cowboy admirers. Mr. Richards becomes angry, thinking she has been flirting, and the explanations some difficulty in convincing him otherwise.

The cowboys arrive in time to be introduced to the husband of the fair charmer, are the happy couple return to that "dear Broadway" and it is a consolation bunch of "punchers" they leave behind them.

THE SKY PILOT'S INTEMPERANCE.—Rev. Fitzgerald Doolittle and wife are called to Lone Gulch. On their arrival the cowboys form a reception committee and tender them an informative welcome. The reverend gentleman does not enjoy the severe heat of the locality, and covers in the protecting arms of his wife.

Believing that the cowboys were more or less blood-thirsty, the reverend gent prepares a strenuous reception he determines to preach them a sermon against intemperance.

Donning the most effectuous garb he can appropriate the saloons and feeling the town there, delivers an oration on the evils of strong drink.

His sermon so to stir the cowboys decide to "wet his whistle," and accordingly climb a flight and find a row of shanties from the opposite barroom. The minister is compelled to swallow a goodly portion of the medicine and is soon in a boisterous mood.

His suggestion "Let's go and serenade my wife" is received with delight and the "band" proceed to the parsonage.

SHORTSIGHTED MISS PRIM.—Miss Prim is the principal of a school for young ladies, and daily escorts her young charges for a walk. The girls, as all girls do, keep up a flirtatious with a party of young fellows, thus taking advantage of Miss Prim's shortsightedness. The boys ajily enter the school one day, and, donning the girls' poke bonnets and cloaks, with Miss Prim at their head, set out for the daily walk. They pass a cafe, and while the principal walks on, the boys tarry and have a good time. Miss Prim misses her charges and eventually finds them at the cafe. Off down the street they go, playing leap-frog, with poor Miss Prim in the rear. They reach the school first, hastily discard the bonnets and cloaks and leave, while the irate principal flounders in and makes for the schoolroom, where the girls are demurely sewing. In spite of their assurances that they have not stirred, Miss Prim gives them a severe lecture, while, to make matters worse, the boys look on through the window.

THANHOUSER.

THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.—John Hancock, one of the most ardent of American patriots, had more to lose than had practically any of his associates in the revolution against George the Third. A traitor at a time when a man with $10,000 was regarded as wealthy, the revolution absolutely beggared him, as he had predicted it would, but from start to finish he did all he could to win freedom for his country.

To Samuel Adams is accorded much of the credit of winning the handsome young millionaire to the side of the patriots, but his sweetheart, Dolly Quincy, after and his wife, also had much to do with the stand he took. For she was an ardent American.

Hancock was an active figure in the famous "Boston Tea Party," when the tea ships from England were attacked, and the wares thrown overboard. He did, like some of the others, try to avoid recognition by disguising himself as an Indian, but was pressed with the crowd on the ship, trying to preserve order, seeing that nothing except the tea was disturbed.

Hancock was ready the cause of the first fighting, that of Lexington, when the British regulars were repulsed by the farmers and minute men. Gage dispatched troops to seize munitions of war at Concord, but on the way they were ordered to stop at Lexington, where Hancock and Adams were, and arrest both as traitors. Gage planning to to send them to England for trial and execution.

But the plans were foiled by Paul Revere, who learning of the expedition in time made his historical ride and, besides arousing the countryside, gave Hancock and Adams the warning that enabled them to make their escape.

Hancock was a member of the Continental Congress and his election as President came about in a dramatic way.

The patriots were in session when an official messenger came from Gage, offering pardons to "all rebels" except Hancock and Adams, who it was declared "should receive condign punishment." The answer was the prompt election of Hancock as President, and when Benjamin Harrison introduced him to the messenger as the presiding officer, he remarked grimly: "We will show Britain how much we value her prescriptions."

As presiding officer, it was Hancock's privilege to first sign the Declaration of Independence, which he did in large, bold characters, saying: "I write so that George the Third may read without his spectacles." And at the time he signed there were many among the patriots who believed that Hancock had signed his death warrant.

Hancock gained his nickname, "The Cavalier of American Liberty," because of his elaborate costumes. Even in those days he would be called a dandy. His garb was particularly remarked upon at a time when Americans, particularly in New England where he lived, were plainly dressed.

THE COURT'S DECREE.—The Blakes are a couple who on account of differences in temperament and a failure on both sides to make concessions have drifted apart. The wife is only mildly interested when her husband proposes to secure a separation. In fact, her principal feeling is one of relief. But her indifference quickly vanishes when the court decree is handed down, granting the separation, but awarding the custody of the child to the husband.

Mrs. Blake wants her little girl and failing to obtain her legally resorts to trickery. She disguises herself and is engaged as governess of her own little daughter now living in the home of her husband's aunt.

The child, who has wept much for her mother, on being told the identity of the new governess gladly agrees to go with her. The two go walking, and the governess returns with the news that the child has wandered away. Her hat found on the shore of a lake in the park gives color to the belief that she has been drowned. This theory is accepted and the governess is discharged. She goes away deeper in the belief that her stratagem has succeeded, for she has hidden the child in her room. Meaning to take her away and begin a new life in some other city.

Her pitiful plan might have been a success for its very daring, had it not been for Violet Gray, the detective. Violet, suspicious of the supposed governess, tracked her to her rooms and from the fire escape saw her fondling a boy, for little Marie had now been disguised. The detective thinking the father to the house and he at once recognizes his child. Violet fears the descent from the mother and Blake sees his advantage. She plays a trick on him and the child comes to her. Blake realizes that with the daughter the mother comes first. He loves his child and wants to make her happy. Legally he is entitled to her custody, but morally he realizes that it is only right that the child in her mother's arms and with bowed head starts out alone.

But this Marie will not allow. She has her mother, but she wants her father, too. She runs after him and begs him to remain with them. Both parents realize that they paid too much attention to little things, that they have overlooked the big thing in their lives, the child. They decide to forgive and forget and to begin life anew remembering that they have one treasure which they can never divide—the love of a little girl.

GROUCHO'S QUIET FOURTH.—Mr. Grouchy could not bear the noise of the celebration of Independence about his house, and when a crowd of youngsters stop in front of his house and commence shooting fire crackers, Grouchy flies to the quietude of the country and goes to a sanitarium, hoping to find rest when a sham battle occurs and he is again driven forth.

He next seeks a quiet Fourth on board a pleasure boat, but, unfortunately, the other passengers are bent on celebrating the glorious fourth and Grouchio is compelled to leap into the river to escape the noise of young and old. American.

Ah! at last Grouchy has found a spot where he buries to the cemetery—here indeed he thinks of finding it quiet, but Grouchio did not know of the burial of a soldier and when the sound of the volley being fired over the soldier's grave reaches the ears of Grouchio, he hurriedly decamps, seeking other quarters.

Next Grouchio comes to a sanitarium and falls from exhaustion. Fortunately for Grouchio the sanitarium being a patriotic citizen has gathered his patients on the lawn in front of the sanitarium and they begin to celebrate in the usual way. After Grouchio has been captured he is pronounced insane by the doctor and locked in a padded cell. As Grouchio is peering forth between the bars of his window, a keeper sees off a box of fire crackers and poor Grouchio is compelled to bear it all.

He starts out like a conqueror, but the burglars go about their work with Mutt as a witness. He does not attract them, however, because they refuse to believe him a policeman. At the station, when the facts are known, the captain and other policemen gently pick up Mutt and tenderly throw him out.

Full of life and energy Jeff comes upon his friend lying bruised and hurt on the sidewalk. He offers consolation, but Mutt will have none of it—was it not Jeff and the message he delivered that caused his downfall? Mutt must be revenged.

They're off! Stick to the hand! Mutt after Jeff over the marathon route. A friendly telegraph pole ends the run, for Jeff scales to the top and watches an affectionate adieu to his foiled chum below. And now, Mutt and Jeff no longer have the blues.

THE GUN-FIGHTER.—Joe Anderson was out of work, and being the sole support of a family of four, consisting of an invalid grandfather, grandmother and two sisters, it was no wonder that he felt willing to take a chance at capturing Jim Rollins, alias Buck Collings, whose picture he had seen posted on a tree, for that self a reward of $1,000.

Joe had been watching a poker game, when suddenly he held his breath in surprise—directly before him stood the original of the picture. Drawing his gun, he commanded the outlaw to throw up his hands, but Buck, ever on the alert, was too quick for him and swinging around, shot Joe in the arm before the young man could fire; then swiftly lining up the man, he dashed through the door, jumped aboard his horse and was almost out of sight before the others could follow. Dismounting as soon as he reached a turn in the road, the pursued man sent his horse on its way, while he ran through the woods, and up to the first shack in sight—bolted into the room and succeeded in persuading the occupants to hide him until he could prove his innocence.

The outlaw had scarcely time to get under the table when the posse with the young man he had wounded came hurrying in, and it was then that Buck learned he had taken shelter in Joe's home. Watching his chance, he sprang through the door—mounted one of the men's horses and galloped off. Although the others gave chase, the outlaw, by doubling back, managed to evade them, and would have gotten away altogether, had he not gone to the aid of a young girl whom he saw running through the woods, closely followed by three Indians.

The girl proved to be Joe's sister, and it was not until he had dispersed of two of the redskins and won in a desperate fight with the third, that he realized Josie Anderson was also severely wounded and unable to walk home. To leave her there was impossible, and as his horse had run off as soon as he had dismounted, there was nothing to do but carry the girl home.

In the meanwhile, the sheriff and his men, unable to find any trace of the outlaw, had returned and were passing the Anderson shack, when Buck appeared. Instantly every gun was drawn—needlessly, however, for the outlaw would fight no more. He had gladly given his life that the girl who had hidden him from the posse might be spared.

POWERS.

WHEN PALS QUARREL.—Dick Roberts is in love with Rosa Throw, daughter of a wealthy cattleman. Hal Stephens is also but Rosa's affections are directed toward Dick. Hal kisses Rose one day in front of a crowd; she rebukes him severely and tells Dick, who threatens him if he ever attempts the insult again. Dick is asking the old man Carew's consent to marry Rose, but on leaving the house, drops a glove, and Hal finds the glove and goes to the back of the house, climbs to the roof, shoots old man Carew through a window, enters the house and escapes with the money. On entering the house, he kicks a trick horse brutally. He escapes and has a fight with his old pal Tom Higgins and shoots him. At the same time Dick is arrested for the murder of old man Carew. Hal having put his glove alongside Carew's dead body. He is tried and found guilty of a clever bit of animal acting the trick horse accuses Hal of the crime.

THE LOVE POTION.—Walter Jones is one of the guests of the Brown's boarding house. He is so persistent in his attention to the young lady boarders that he gains their enmity instead of affections. He reads an "ad" in the paper, whereby by sending 25 cents he can secure a Love Potion, which when placed in the tea or coffee of a person would cause them to fall violently in love with the nearest one of them. An actor arrives at the house and the girls suggest that he disguise as a woman, they having discovered Jones' Love Potion scheme. By a ruse the disguised actor gets the love potion and falls madly in love with Jones, who after being ridiculed by the boarders for his actions, is glad to leave the house.

THE HAUNTED ISLAND.—On discovering that the good ship Columbia is on fire, the entire crew, together with the passengers, take to sea in life boats. Robert Gill and Louise Gale, lovers, are the lone occupants of one boat, and are cast ashore on the haunted island. They are discovered with ragged clothing wandering through the woods when a bell is found suspended from a tree. They ring it and depart for another part of the island, but are suddenly startled by the sound of the same bell. Thinking that they were alone on the island then fears arouse them to a search. An abandoned trap door is discovered near the shore, entering into a cave dug in the ground. The couple enter and discover an old pirate dog, together with a chest of gold. The mysterious bell finger enters and is shot by Gill. He falls on the shore writhing in agony and Gill and Louise are horrified to find that he is half man and half monkey. The shot arouses a ship at sea which sights them. Rescue is the climax to the story.

CHAMPION.

A COWBOY AND A LORD.—An English nobleman, Lord Ronan, has fallen in love with an American girl, Grace Hilden, and at her mother's invitation he comes to visit their ranch to see the Western life. He is met at the station by the cowboys, and escorted to the ranch. Mrs. Hilden is ambitious and would like her daughter to marry a title.

Grace, though she is courteous and polite to the Englishman, prefers her cowboy lover. Her mother seeing this tells the cowboy that Grace is engaged to Lord Ronan and sends him off.

As he goes away he sees a Mexican greaser and bireling plotting together and the greaser writes a note and sends it off with the bireling. The cowboy notices the malicious expression on the Mexican's face, but continues to ride on.

The note which the Mexican sent and which was supposed to be from Bob, requests him to ride and bring Grace to a lonely spot. She, thinking to meet Bob, comes to the rendezvous and finds herself surrounded by the two Mexicans.

In the meantime, Bob remembering the Mexican's look, suspects and returns in time to see Grace carried off. He follows, and as while the bireling, who is in the rear, is shot. Bob gains on the Mexican and finally manages to stop him. He takes Grace back and tells her he is going away forever. She cannot understand it and enters her home and finds Bob gone.

The Englishman, who has been waiting for her, proposes marriage and she bursts into tears, telling him of her love for Bob and his sudden departure. The Englishman seeing the reason of Bob's departure, resolves to follow him, and learning from the other cowboys the direction Bob took, follows the track and overtakes him. Bob, learning that it is he who is loved, returns and the welcome he receives from Grace proves it to be true. The cowboy, true type of American, has won out against an English lord.

THE FIGHTING PARSON.—Some of the more startling incidents in the life of the Rev. James Caldwell, the fighting parson of New Jersey, the hero of the battle of Springfield, have been reenacted for the first time from the oblivion of a century and a half, and are here presented by the Champion players with an adherence to historical verity and correctness of detail that is truly wonderful.

The tories, or Royalists, as they were patriots, and many and horrible were the atrocities they perpetrated against them, but nothing did they do more infamous than the wanton, brutal murder of Mrs. James Caldwell, the wife of the fighting parson.

The reverend gentleman had cast his lot with the patriots, for he loved his country and detested her tyrannical rulers; and we see to this film representing what it meant—and what it cost to be a patriot in those days.

We see the parson in the pulpit expounding the word of God, and there on either side of the holy book, two blunderbusses—the huge pistols then in vogue. And ranged behind him, on the platform, a number of muskets, the old-fashioned flintlocks, terrible instruments in the hands of the clear-eyed, courageous, shooting "Minute Men," as the unorganized patriots were then termed.

The tories and Hessians approaching one day, Mistress Caldwell went off to a neighbor's hard-by, taking with her her little girl. The fond father waved his beloved wife and child an affectionate adieu, little dreaming of the dark tragedy that was soon to cloud his life.

But a few days had elapsed, the holy Sabbath had come, and the parson was in the midst of his sermon, when a messenger arrived telling him of the cold-blooded murder of his beloved spouse! Oh, the horror of it! What consternation in that house of prayer then broke forth! Men seized their weapons and rushed out following their parson's lead.

"THANKS, OLD BOY!"

Just to give you an idea of how my customers feel, I made this extract from William A. Smith's letter. He is proprietor of the Star Theatre, Head to Toe, Wisconsin. "Thanks for the good programs, old boy. Things are coming fine." That's the way my customers feel and write. And in the Sacred Heroic Deed of Personhood, 9 males out of 10 are the greatest to have you call me "old boy." When you become tired of patronizing around with pokers, hook up with the "old boy."

KEEP YOUR DRUM HEADS DRY

The very nature of drum heads causes them to absorb moisture readily, and when the heads become damp it is an absolute certainty that your drum will lose its brilliancy.

Our latest invention, the Electric Drum Heater, entirely overcomes this difficulty, for by its use you can keep your drum brilliant and snappy regardless of the weather.

This device can be attached to any drum and the connecting plug will fit any ordinary 110-volt incandescent lamp socket. It gives no light; never burns out; may be turned on and off at will, or if desired, entirely removed in a few seconds time. Entire outfit, including the Heater proper, two connecting plugs, and six feet of cord, weighs eight ounces—the Heater but two. It is practically indestructible and can easily be carried in your drum case.

Be sure and say whether you wish it for Snare Drum, Bass Drum, or Tympani, as each instrument requires a different strength.

into the death chamber he came, followed by his faithful people, there to gaze on, for still cold hands of her whose heartbeats once pulsated with warm and tenderest affection for him. Soon to stop his little girl baby in her mother's form, kneeling and weeping one very sweet one in the despair and anguish of her little soul. Oh, the agonies of it all seemed too much for mortal eyes to gaze on!

We wonder little after that to see the loving lounges of the gentlemen against those hated bars set on by their minister of God. We wonder little to see him, after the most vain resort of wadding for their guns, rush into the church, when nowhere else could it be had, and grab up armfuls of hymn books, heretofore by him considered impure "Watts" and cursing forth to his men, cry out as to them the hymn books among them: "Give them Watts, boys, give them Watts!"

THE KING'S FAVORITE.—The Knight's daughter goes to the trysting-place, where she discovers a note left by the young squire. Her action is watched by a jealous rival, who tells the girl's parents of their daughter's perfidy. Whilst he is relating his discovery, the young squire and his love are enjoying a pleasant tete-a-tete in the grounds of the castle. They are again discovered by the rival who summons the old knight, and together they confront the lovers, the young squire being turned out of the grounds. But his rival's triumph is not long-lived. It is discovered that he is connected with the enemy. War has been proclaimed, and the King is busy examining plans. These the rival steals, but his crime is detected by the young squire, who russels with him. In the combat the scourge is torn off the plans, though the hero is wounded in the encounter. As recompense, he is promoted to the rank of officer, and still tracking down his rival, whose treachery he ultimately unveils, he sees him attempting the destruction of the ship on which the King is to dispatch the letter. But rather than submit to capture, the traitor jumps overboard, and is drowned. The battle, a thrilling scene, results in victory for the King, who on his return to his own country is the means of bringing about a union between the knight's daughter and her gallant lover.

A FASCINATING WIDOW.—Herman Schmeltz and Michael McSweeney were fast friends, up to the time of the arrival of a charming widow at their boarding house, when they became bitter rivals. They meet the widow in the reception room, where she is told that she must now decide between them. Suddenly McSweeney flashes a fat roll of currency. This, of course, decides the question. McSweeney is accepted.

Poor Herman is downcast over the incident. While McSweeney is taking a bath, Herman tiptoes into his room and steals his wedding clothes.

McSweeney is surprised to find his clothes gone, and rushes about everywhere. In the meantime, Herman is being wedded at the church to the charming widow. Just as the ceremony is finished, McSweeney arrives. But he can do nothing but sit and grin.

A TERRIBLE CATASTROPHE.—Kid Vinnie takes her rag doll brother out in the go-cart for a morning's airing. As she wheels it back and forth before the house she is called into her home by her mother and leaves the doll outside on the walk. Mischievous Johnnie comes along and seeing the carriage by the door realizes that here is an opportunity for deviltry. He ties the baby carriage to the rear of a wagon that stands nearby and the mother and Vinnie come out of the house just in time to see the baby carriage go rocking up the street in tow of the wagon.

GREATER LOVE HATH NO MAN.—In the eastern part of New Mexico is located the little mining town of Gallach. There, however, we find an active mining camp dependent largely on the famous Gallach mine for its existence.

Living in the camp are Bud Florence, who is loved by Jake. Florence, too, loves Jake. A new superintendent arrives to take charge of the mining property. The new arrival meets Florence, and the man and girl fall in love.

Discontent among the Mexican and half-breed miners develops. They mutiny, coming to the office making demands which the super promptly refuses and orders them from the place. The ruffians withdraw to arm themselves and then plan an attack upon the office and the death of their boss. Florence overhears the plot, and while he has no love for Harry, determines for the sake of Florence to save them.

He rushes to the office and warns them just as the mob appears. They are paralyzed and finally take refuge in a narrow pass. With only one horse, escape for the party is impossible. Jake forces Harry against his will to take the horse and Florence and escape. They depart seeking aid, which is found in the shape of a troop of cavalry out scouting. Thus reinforced, they rush back to Jake's aid, but too late, he has fought his last fight and given up his life for those dear to him.

Los Angeles.

Star Goes Dark.—The Star Moving Picture Theatre, East Fifth between Main and Los Angeles streets, has again gone dark, after having only been open about a month. The last proprietor of the Star is said to have lost $1,500 in the venture. This theater, in spite of a rather good location, has been a hoodoo to every manager that ever tried to operate it. It is within a half block of Main street, one of the city's main arteries of travel, and on a cross street also well traveled. The theater has tried both Licensed and Independent service at varying ages from "junk" to second-runs with the same result—failure in the end. The owner of the property announces that the building will be remodeled and leased as a storeroom.

Electric.—The Electric Theater, North Main street, opposite the post office, has recently changed its service from Independent to Licensed pictures, and is now running three of the latter for a five-cent admission.

Iris Breaks Record.—Messrs. Hogan & Jensen, proprietors of the Iris, report that last week's receipts exceeded any individual week's receipts since they took over the house some eleven months ago. This is an unusual record to make in summer business, but its management showed the writer their books in support of the statement. The theater has been playing to excellent business ever since they put on Independent service. They are using four selected second-run Independent pictures. The Los Angeles correspondent for another trade journal in a recent issue of his paper states that the lease of the Iris "changed hands recently," or words to that effect. The management of the Iris wish to correct a misstatement. The lease of the Iris has not changed hands recently, the present proprietors, Messrs. Hogan & Jensen, are still operating the theater, have been for the past eleven months, and will continue to do so until further notice.

S. M. P. M. M.'s Association, at a meeting held June 7th, voted to limit all five-cent theaters, Independent as well as Licensed, to a three-reel program, with a song, if desired. The ten cent, and upward, picture theaters are limited to not over four reels and songs or specialties, but no vaudeville. All the members of the association are not in harmony as a result of the vote, and among certain houses hostility to the ruling is in evidence. It is hardly likely that the Hyman and the College and Optic will cut out their vaudeville, since to do so would place them on the mercy of smaller houses, against which they could not successfully compete, with a straight bill of pictures for their higher admission. Then, too, there is a certain amount of complaint among the five-cent houses showing Independent pictures, who claim that the patrons demand the four-reel bill. The General Film Company and the Licensed exhibitors association meeting for the fifth will also be exerting every influence to swing everybody into line with the association's ruling. There has also been considerable talk regarding supplying the city's vaudeville houses with pictures. Coming under this complaint are the Orpheum, Empress, Pantages, each backed by a powerful theatrical syndicate, and should they be refused local exchange service, there would soon be quite a different kind of noise. All the local exchange representatives were present at Wednesday's meeting, but had little to say regarding their opinions of the majority vote. The exhibitors also voted to discontinue the practice of issuing souvenirs, prizes, coupons and other "ballyhoo" business stunts.

Captain H. M. Lawson, a Honolulu exhibitor of note, and an officer in the Mexican Insurrecto Army of Lower California, has been in Los Angeles for the past week on business. Captain Lawson owns a half interest in the following Honolulu theaters: The Art, seating 500; the Gayety, seating 800; and the new auditorium, nearing completion, which will seat 2,000. For the past few months Captain Lawson has been seeing service in the Lower California Insurrecto Army under General Price. The captain is in charge of the commissariat corps, with headquarters at Tia Juana, just across the Mexican line. While in Los Angeles and Long Beach the captain is the guest of W. L. Howland, president of the California Motion Picture Manufacturing Company. He is in Los Angeles on a brief furlough and will soon return to his regiment at Tia Juana.

El Rodeo Theater Opens.—The El Rodeo, Los Angeles' newest picture theater, opened Saturday at 805 E. Fifth street. This cosy little picture palace is strictly first class in appointments and service. The new theater has a tile lobby floor, marble wainscoting, high grade opera chairs, very well equipped and comfortable operating room with two machines, and is one of the prettiest and best equipped five-cent theaters in the city. The new theater opens with late-run Independent service. Miss F. T. Emery is the proprietress. Miss Emery has the honor to be the city's first woman exhibitor.

Florodora Closes.—The Florodora, a five-cent picture theater using Licensed service, located on East First street near Main, has closed its doors. It is said that a new management proposes to take over the theater and reopen after necessary alterations can be made.

Crown Redecorated.—The Crown Theater management has finished the repairing and alteration of the house without interference to business. The lobby and the inside have been refinished and redecorated and electric lights added to the lobby. A new exterior sign of attractive design has just been completed and placed in position over the lobby. The theater is now using three reels of licensed third-run film secured through the General Film Company. The name of the theater has been changed and it will hereafter be known as the Rose Theater.

Vernon Theater Closes.—The Vernon Theater, located in one of the city's suburbs, has closed for the summer.

Independent Film Exchange.—Under the management of Searles & Campbell, has opened offices at 547 S. Broadway, and announces to the Southwestern trade that it is ready for business. They are also handling a complete line of machine accessories and exhibitors' supplies.

Edison Goes Dark.—The Edison Theater, Spring street between Fourth and Fifth streets, last week closed its doors. The house has been using old-film Licensed service. It is not likely that the house will reopen any time in the near future.

Clune's Sign.—The appeal of W. H. Clune from a recent decision, finding him guilty of having violated the city fire ordinance by erecting a flasher electric sign over his Broadway theater, was heard recently by Superior Court Judge Willis. The case was taken under advisement, the decision to be made public at a later date.

Luna Park Opens.—Luna Park, Los Angeles' miniature Coney Island, opened Saturday, June 10, to excellent business, in which the theater concessions shared generously. The park used to be known as the Chutes. Several months ago the lease of the park changed hands, the new lessees being Thomson & Snow, the well-known amusement men, who after gaining control, poured a wealth of money into the rehabilitation of the old park, putting in an immense roller coaster, a Rapids, enlarging the Zoo, and putting in other high class concessions including a moving picture theater and a vaudeville house. The opening attendance was 30,000, and good business is looked for throughout the summer in spite of the beach competition.

Union Theater, Main, near Third, has changed its service from Independent to Licensed and is showing three reels of the latter.

In the Mississippi Valley.

Dee Robinson, of Peoria, who has been associated with Vernon Seaver in his many amusement enterprises, has purchased the interests of Mr. Seaver in the Crescent and Empress theaters in Peoria, giving him practically the controlling interest in these, besides the Princess and Liberty theaters, also in Peoria. G. K. Robinson is also associated in the Crescent and Empress deals. Work of remodeling the Crescent will be delayed for several months, while the erection of a theater in the Comstock property in the 300 block, South Adams street, now under lease to Mr. Seaver, is not probable until next year.

Howard Carr has opened an airdome on Capitol avenue just off Sixth street, Springfield, Ill., remodeling the plant which stood there. The first night was a success as far as crowds go, the first show having an overflow of several hundred persons. Harry Steelman, a local amateur of some prominence in fraternity circles, sang and a vaudeville team "sketched." For the first night an musical program was given. Essanay's Cuba and Athletics World's Championship games, Vitagraph's pictures of Annette Kellerman, the swimmer, and Edison's "Edna's Imprisonment." The pictures were good and clear and the musical accompaniment of piano and drums was more or less consistent. The front of the airdome is well lighted and attractive.

The Pines, the moving picture theater at Mt. Vernon, Ill., has moved to new quarters.

An airdome, giving vaudeville and pictures, has been opened on Tenth street, between Vermont and Broadway, in Quincy, Ill.

Highland Park, Quincy, Ill., is reported to be contemplating the installation of moving pictures.

John H. DeDecker, of Virden, Ill., manager of a moving picture theater in Johnson City, Ill., and Mrs. Gordon Spiller, of Johnson City, were recently married at Hillsboro, Ill.

Harry le Logue, who is connected with the White Palace theater of Carterville, has opened an air dome at Duquoine, Ill., using a half park canvas to enclose the stock. He is giving three reels of pictures for ten cents.

A set of Deagan's electric bells has been installed by the management of the open house at Pawnee, Ill.

Al Madison has purchased a site at Elsah, Ill., and will erect an airdome for 1,200, with a 25-foot stage. Before winter it will be enclosed so as to seat 600 people. Moving pictures will be shown this summer.

The Chicago Motion Picture Company, of Chicago, has been incorporated, with a capital stock of $2,500, to manufacture and sell motion pictures machines and accessories. The incorporators are Rupert G. Stronach, C. E. Robinson and L. G. Ward.

F. H. M.

Washington, D. C.

Since the change of management of the General Film Company and the location of the offices of that concern in the Bank of Commerce and Savings moments of dissatisfaction have been heard in the territory covered by the company. Complaints of service, discontinuous treatment, and the refusal of free run reels in Washington have resulted in many of the former patrons of the Universal Film seeking the independent field. This dissatisfaction is not confined to those who have severed connection with the General Film Company, but even to those who are using this service. Exactly what is the cause of Manager Colvin cannot be determined, as so far it has been impossible to obtain an interview from him on account of press of other business. This, however, is promised shortly, when the "other side" of the situation will be presented.

The manager of the Henderson North of England Film Exchange, Mr. J. Henderson, spent several days in Washington while here thoroughly enjoyed in sightseeing and in looking over the way we conduct the motion picture industry. He met with many surprises, mostly of American ingenuity, hustle, and business ability. He spoke highly of our films and told how eagerly they were sought in England. He had his picture taken with President Taft (one of America's latest fads) and was so pleased with the ingenuous deceit that he gave the photographer a large order and intends to scatter those among his friends in England.

The installation of the $5,000 cooling plant at the Cosmos by the air-washing process seems as the only one of its kind here. Manager Bryanski is an up-to-date man and always looking to the comforts of his patrons. Consequently the usually big attendance is continued at the Cosmos.

The Moore Amusement Company is the latest entrance in the motion picture field here. This is headed by Tom Moore, the original film man of the national capital, who for many years conducted a film exchange of his own which he quite recently sold out to the General Film Company and for a time was manager of the latter concern. This new company controls five moving picture houses in the city and expects to enter even larger fields in the fall. Mr. Moore's father, largely acquainted in business circles in Washington, is a close partner with his son in his new enterprise.

Seattle Wash.

The Crown Theater, near First and Madison Street, closed up last week. The location was a very poor one.

Mr. W. H. Harbeck, the official Canadian Pacific Motion Picture Photographer, is at present in Seattle, and will be here for some time. Mr. Harbeck's address is, P. O. Box 68, Seattle, Wash.

The Star Theater at First and Madison Street, opened Saturday, June 3, 1911, with three reels of films and vaudeville. The following Monday afternoon the manager was talking to the operator in the operating room when a reel of film caught on fire from some unknown cause. The machine was not running at the time of the fire. The operator grabbed the reel and smothered the blaze. The house is now closed until further notice.

The Washington Theater, First and Columbia Street, formerly owned by Mr. Joe Bloom, has been sold to Messrs. Smith and Howe from Boston, Mass. The policy of the house will remain the same. The film service has been changed from Canadian Film Exchange, to Pacific Film Exchange.

The next regular meeting of the Moving Picture Operators' Local, 150 I. A. T. S. E., will be held June 20, 1911. All members are urgently requested to be present, as nominations for the new officers will take place.

The Independent Exhibitors have formed an agreement whereby no exhibitor will show over three weeks to the week. Below is a copy of the agreement:

Agreement of Moving Picture Exhibitors.

This agreement, made and entered into this first day of June, 1911, by and between the following owners of moving picture theatres situated in the City of Seattle, County of King and State of Washington:

The undersigned hereby agree to run or exhibit only those reels of moving picture films, consisting of not more than three one thousand feet of film to one part.

It is further agreed that the undersigned shall forfeit the sum of fifteen ($15) dollars for each and every violation of this agreement.

Signed by Independent Exhibitors.

The Grand Opera House, situated in Eugene here, has been opened June 5, 1911, to moving pictures. The policy of the house is vaudeville and Licensed Films. The grand opening of the house will be given in a manner worthy of the World.

Manager Elwell states he has secured the rights to show the production of "Faust" in this city. It is being thoroughly advertised and will no doubt make a big drawing card.

The Casco (A) Theater Tirard and Pike Street, "the house with the mirror screen," has instituted a special idea for proprietors, and is getting very fine results.

The Minnesota and Operators Association report progress on the motion and expect to have some by the middle of next week.

It is rumored around town that a department store of this city is intending to install a moving picture machine for the patrons of the store.

Mr. Joe Bloom, formerly manager of The Washington Theater, has left for New York City and is expected back in about two weeks.

L. L. GOLDSMITH.

Indianapolis

Under the auspices of the Indianapolis Commercial Club, the city will have a "safe and sane" 4th of July celebration, and among the events will be Presidents Park. A feature of the celebration will be an historical parade made up of floats arranged for about 20,000 school children, many of whom will ride in the floats. There will also be an athletic meet for school children during the afternoon. The Motiomeque Company of this city has arranged to take moving pictures of the parade and athletic meet and these pictures will be exhibited over the country to show what can be accomplished in the way of a "safe and sane" celebration.

The Lyman H. Howe pictures were put on at the Park Theater for a second week, beginning Sunday, June 18. The first week proved so successful another week was arranged. This is the first time prices ranging from 15 to 50 cents have been charged in Indianapolis for a purely moving picture show, and the experiment proved a success. Pictures exhibited the second week included Perils of Fishing in the North Sea; American Army Life; The Effect of Music on Wild Animals; A Mohammedan Religious Festival in Delhi, India; Through the Beautiful Gorges in Var, France; Logging in Italy; Canada in Winter; Making a Monster Battleship Cannon and a Battleship in Action.

B. F. Keith's, which is running pictures during the summer, has reduced the admission to five cents for any part of the show. When first the pictures were first put on the admission was five and ten cents.

The Dixie Amusement Company is requesting the pictures of the 500 mile automobile race held in this city May 30, at the English Opera House, during the week of June 15.

Fred Dickson is remodeling a building on the south side of Washington street, between Senate and Capitol avenues, and will open a moving picture theater seating 600 people about July 15.

An airdome is under construction at Fulton and Michigan streets and will be occupied and operated by A. Brunet. It will seat about five hundred people.

Comparison Not Always Odious

Look at It!
Then Look at the Other Fellow's

Of course it is better. Our QUALITY forces us to limit out output of the MOTIOGRAPH. Yes—we could turn our outfits out faster as we have the largest and most modern plant in the World devoted to the manufacture of Motion Picture Machines. BUT—WE KNOW that every MOTIOGRAPH sold guarantees the sale of at least two more. That is why—we make fewer AND MAKE THEM RIGHT. We are kept busy too. YOU DON'T HAVE TO BUY SOME OTHER MACHINE FIRST to convince yourself that you MUST HAVE THE MOTIOGRAPH. LET US SEND YOU CONCLUSIVE PROOF FOR THE ASKING.

Facts and Comments

A few days ago the columns of the yellow and semi-yellow press of this city teemed with news about one of those sordid affairs between old men and young women, for which, among other things, New York is infamous. We cannot soil our columns with a more extended reference and beg to explain to our readers, that this brief allusion is necessary for the purpose of pointing a moral. What would have happened, if a film maker had attempted to turn this salacious scandal into profit by giving it a representation in moving pictures? The chorus of condemnation, that would have greeted any such attempt, would have included not only the censors and the police, but the film makers themselves. The rash act would have destroyed that particular film maker's future usefulness. We have in this industry long ago outlived the portrayal of current sensational scandals.

It was not always thus. When the industry was very young, long before there was any concerted action on the part of responsible elements to control its morale, the crime and trial of a young millionaire, which at that time excited the curiosity of the morbid and vulgar, was actually represented in moving pictures. There were exhibitors then, who welcomed this film. The owner of one small theater in Philadelphia remarked to the writer, that "the public wanted this sort of thing and must have it," that he was in the business not "to educate the public, but to get their money" and that anything looked good to him, as long as "it fetched the nickels of the crowd." "I think," said he, "the Thaw-White tragedy is more good to us exhibitors than the Passion Play."

* * *

What a glorious change for the better has come over the moving picture field since that time. The low-browed exhibitor has become a rare exception, a negligible quantity in fact and no part of the show business is today in better and cleaner hands than the business of making and of showing moving pictures. The circumstance that makes the great uplift of the moving picture a permanent and certain thing, lies in the fact, that it has developed strictly from within. The answer of the film makers to unjust criticism in press and pulpit and on the bench has been a steady improvement in the quality of the picture. There could be no better argument. With its high ethical and educational standards the moving picture of the hour resembles, when compared to the yellow press, a clear, limpid pool besides a drainage pipe.

With the moving picture elevating the general taste, we have great hope that the enthusiastic analysis of social sewers, which parades under the name of journalism in this town, may soon be stopped and the journalistic X-rays may be diverted from jails, prisons, dives and scandals. Nothing would please us better than to have the public taste, cultivated by clean, amusing, entertaining and instructive pictures, turn in disgust from the printed mess of nastiness, which the yellow set before their readers almost every hour of the day.

* * *

It pays to be acquainted with your audience. Get on speaking terms with them and there is always a common ground for a metting of the minds—the subjects of the films. An audience is always attentive, if it knows that you have something to say. The better you say it, the greater the effect of course, but one does not need to be an orator to say in a few words what the next film is all about. It takes the film maker days to get out a good picture and your audience is expected to understand it all in a few minutes. Of course the audience is bound to understand something, to get the main points at any rate, but the clearer the picture is made to them the better they will like it. Moreover they always like to hear from the manager or owner. If you confine yourself in your remarks to the literal truth and never promise more than you can perform your voice will be a more valuable advertising medium than either screen or printer's ink. You will be believed, and every word you utter will be listened to with the closest attention. Sincerity is the greatest aid to true eloquence.

A premium for a "different kind" of illustrated song would be in order both as regards words and music. A late tendency to suggestiveness should be combated with the utmost vigor. If an offer were to be made today of a prize of ten dollars for the worst illustrated song, the competition would be killing. One illustrated song is bad until another has been heard.

The strike of operators in Cleveland, Ohio, is a regrettable incident in the business which is fortunately of rare occurrence. To what extent they may have been justified in taking this drastic step to enforce their demands we do not have correct information; however, we think the differences of opinion could not have been so great that they could not have been settled by arbitration. No doubt there are exhibitors who do not treat their operators with the consideration they deserve or pay them an adequate salary. On the other hand there are many exhibitors who are both humane and liberal. This must have been the case in Cleveland, yet by the general call out the just suffered with the unjust.

But it is not the exhibitors who are the worst offenders against the operator or his worst enemy. What of the civic authorities who unnecessarily compel the operator to be confined in a small cell, in many cases unventilated save by the apertures through which to project the picture? At this time of the year this is cruelty to animals, and operators are almost human. No, this is not correct; almost all operators are human, and some of them more human, more civilized and more intellectual than their employers, although by force of circumstances they are compelled to do menial work. Reasonable demands should have reasonable consideration. Our own observations in going the rounds of the theatres is that exhibitors who employ the best operators, paying good wages and not working them overtime, get the biggest audiences, and so make more money themselves.

WEEKLY RECORD OF RELEASES.

Exhibitors are invited to comment on the new form of recording the weekly releases shown on pages 1591, 1592. It gives in chronological order and classifies each release, also giving the name of the maker. There is a column for the exchange number of the reel, another for the date on which it is run by the exhibitor, and another for remarks such as "good," "ordinary," "repeat," etc. It is possible that a more generally useful form can be devised which will then be adopted as a permanent feature of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD. Exhibitors who have a better form to suggest will please submit a sketch thereof. The sketches will be submitted to a committee of exhibitors and the contributor of the one which receives the most votes will be suitably rewarded. We continue to give the weekly program in condensed form and the back release dates. If, in the opinion of the exhibitor, any of these forms can be well dispensed with, it will help to relieve the pressure on our space. Do not hesitate to write and offer suggestions as to how your paper can be of more service to you.

The Influence of the Picture

"Spectator," in an esteemed theatrical contemporary, pounces upon a rhodomontade in a recent editorial in the MOVING PICTURE WORLD in a loyal attempt to exalt his profession and affiliations. Of course the WORLD did not expect to be taken up literally, although it was quite serious when it opened up a discussion on "The Psychic Force and Value of the Moving Picture" with the statement that "In a year or two, we venture to predict, the public taste will be molded altogether by the products of the film-makers and, thus molded, will manifest itself in plain and numerous ways." "Spectator," who carefully evaded or failed to see the point in the argument, asks: "What of the printing press, the stage, the pulpit, the platform, the public schools, colleges, social, ethical and political organizations and many other influences?"

What indeed? Why does "Spectator" beg the question and pass it up with the flippant remark that "the MOVING PICTURE WORLD should come down out of the clouds if it would be taken seriously"? The printing press, we do not deny, is the dominating influence. Curiously enough, however, "Spectator," farther on in his article, answers his own question and renders negative the value of his principal illustration by characterizing the rendering into motion pictures of one of the gems of literature as "a motion picture poem, pure and simple." In a late appreciation of the masterly visualization of Tennyson's poem, "Enoch Arden," he re-echoes the sentiments expressed in the MOVING PICTURE WORLD of June 17th that "the poetry of the story was conveyed almost wholly by the masterful blending of scene, action and dramatic expression." Is not this a tribute to the "psychic force and value of the moving picture"? Is it not an unanswerable argument in favor of the possibilities of the picture in competing with literature in molding public taste? If not, what is?

As to "Spectator's" other illustrations, they have but to be named to show that whatever influence they possess is becoming more and more affected by the ascendency of this popular mode of expression and illustration—the motion picture: "The stage."—No more can the stage, of which our contemporary is a noble champion, compare with the psychic force and influence of the silent drama. "The pulpit."—As an aid or as an adjunct to the pulpit the motion picture is being very rapidly pressed into service. "The platform."—Here, also, the influence of the motion picture is not to be gainsaid. "The public schools, colleges, social, ethical and political organizations."—All jostling each other in their efforts to enlist the picture to further increase their influence.

No doubt, "Spectator," in his narrowed sphere, can have but little accurate information as to the inroads that the motion picture has already made into the various realms he has enumerated and many others which he did not mention. He may be pardoned, therefore, for failing to see the serious aspects of this growing influence. The MOVING PICTURE WORLD, which our contemporary elsewhere kindly refers to as a representative class journal, does not have to come down out of the clouds to realize the potent influence of the cause it represents. Its manifestations are before us day by day, and the growing interest and the widening scope of this modern means of education and entertainment impresses us very seriously indeed with the power of its influence as a molder of public taste.

This is why we wrote in such strong terms as we did to impress upon the film-makers their vast and growing responsibilities, which exhortation, if we are not very much mistaken, our critical friend will both commend and approve. For [illegible] every spectator is a prejudice.

The Historian of the Future

BY HENRY.

The moving picture is already acknowledged to be invaluable as the best means of entertaining the people with drama and comedy. In the field of education, motography is also attaining a prominent and secure position. The scenic and industrial picture has won for the moving picture a place as an educational factor, as well as an entertainment exponent. The moving picture will soon hold a position as the historian of the world; indeed, recent events have given the cinematograph the chance to make a real and invaluable start in this direction, both in the old world and on this continent. There can be no doubt that recent developments of the art of photography, with principal reference to motion photography, will act as a check upon the fancy and favoritism of future historians. In fifty years from the time of this article, children in our schools will be taught history with moving pictures as the principal guide. History is to at last become authentic, with no mists nor gaps hanging over the records—and cinematography is to work that miracle! The champagne riots which recently made all France tremble, were photographed by the moving picture cameras. This riot, to become a matter of history, has been saved for the future by this means, and we have the true recording of the events as they recently took place. It is a matter of record, that these very moving pictures have already been introduced in France, and that the originals and prime movers in that disturbance have been called to account. This has only been made possible by the motion picture, true and unerring in its work. Some thousands of miles from France, history was also authentically made a matter for future guidance, when the moving picture camera photographed the recent scrimmages of insurrectos and federals just across the Rio Grande, in Mexico. There is no room for argument, but that the motion pictures of these uprisings will be universally accepted as the true picture of what happened. The written story will merely corroborate the work of the motion picture. Should the two historians disagree, the odium of offering the world misinformation on this subject will be placed on the writers. For cinematography cannot be made to lie, it is a machine that merely records what is happening.

Becoming more retrospective, and tracing back our footsteps, what would we not give for a moving picture of the exploits of Julius Caesar, of Alexander, or of Bonaparte. Indeed, a motion picture of our own Colonel Roosevelt charging up San Juan Hill would be of such a value as to become priceless. The fact that this gallant charge is often said to be merely a vision, would make the reel of even more than usual value. This fact, happening in our own time, shows more clearly than almost anything else could, how priceless will be the work of motography as historian. Many of the great events of the world, when history was in the making, have been perpetuated in imagination upon the painted canvas. But, how much better, how priceless, had these same deeds been truly and accurately printed on celluloid. History has now a new means of accurate immortal record, and that means is the moving picture camera. The modern world is presented with a true chronicle of achievement, and this is easily among the greatest boons of modern times. Adding the ability of the motion picture to record history with absolute precision, to its work as a purveyor of instructive and educational amusement, we see in the motion picture an almost insurmountable and regal power. Verily, motography has no competitor in all the world for multiplicity of usefulness.

Photoplay Realism.

An Optimistic View.

By Jay A. Gove.

The sluggard is wiser in his own conceit than seven men that can render a reason.—Prov. 26:16.

Criticism is the laggard of the photoplay army.

While photoplay producers have profited by man's cumulative experience in the art of staging dramas, photoplay critics have been contented with the puerile attitude and outgrown methods of the dramatic critic of past generations.

In production, the photoplay has really lost very few of the essentials with which science-developing study of dramatics endowed it. In criticism, it has profited comparatively nothing through experience and heredity. And so today we hear men seriously demanding of the motion picture company's stage manager and actors the production of plays in accordance with individual views of what constitutes an artistic performance, rather than that they reach a certain well-defined and commonly accepted standard of dramatic achievement. In other words, the photoplay critic is measuring picture plays by a rule of individual prejudice which the true critic of the drama long ago discarded. Dramatic art, as developed for photographic reproduction, is now re-passing the mud-throwing crowd from which it escaped in the earlier days of its history—in the days when every critic insisted that every play, and every situation in every play, be presented in exactly the manner in which the critic would have presented it. As a consequence, the work of stage managers and actors, which dramatic critics passed as legitimate when these managers and actors were connected with the Broadway or other similar theatrical companies, has become "nonsensical," "ridiculous" and "absurd" since these interpreters have faced the strictures of photoplay censors.

* * *

One of the indictments most persistently brought against photoplays is that their situations are often unnatural. Unfortunately this allegation merely betokens the critic's inexperience. The critic objects, perhaps, because a deserted wife, suddenly restored to the arms of a reformed but once brutal husband, does not give way to a flood of tears. He does not believe it possible under such conditions that the sense of joy and thanksgiving could be temporarily supreme in woman's nature. Perhaps he is right; perhaps his experience with women under such circumstances has been limited. Certainly he is wrong in assuming that no woman so circumstanced has ever smiled, or that the individual pictured on the screen must always be an average individual and never a distinctive type, given to peculiarly individual methods of expressing emotion.

Perhaps, too, the photoplay critic will contend that the emotion developed through the death of a loved one must invariably be expressed by weeping, and will pronounce unnatural the stage picture of a person not thus affected. But, if so, it will be through forgetfulness of the existence of modern stoics who profess to see in deathbed-side tears the outward expression of unadulterated selfishness. And there are thousands of such persons, even in our own America.

* * *

Then there are the situations that stage managers or scenario writers devise which are objected to solely on the ground that they are unusual. Witness an objection recently made to the course of an eye specialist in permitting his wife to enter his operating room while he had a patient in the operating chair. The criticism, as applied to the specialist, will probably be admitted to be sound, but it is not necessarily sound when applied to a character in a photoplay. It does not follow because we would not patronize a specialist who was guilty of such a practice that there are no specialists who so offend. As a matter of fact the writer has on numerous occasions been called from his office, formerly adjoining that of a prosperous oculist, to discuss baseball, or something equally irrelevant, while the specialist was performing delicate and painful operations on patients' eyes. Moreover, although the doctor had two operating rooms, each thoroughly equipped, these operations were performed, and successfully performed, in his waiting room, the patient sitting the while, head thrown back, in an ordinary office chair.

Now this may be unusual practice, but it is not without parallel. For years I have patronized a dentist whose office is in the front room of his residence and whose operating room is in an alcove off the office. The dentist, so desiring, may draw a curtain across this end of the room and shut it off, but I have no recollection of ever having seen the curtain drawn. The dentist's wife keeps her husband's books and makes it her particular business to become personally acquainted with and attentive to his customers. She has frequently discussed personal affairs with her husband while he has been actively and profitably engaged in operating on me with buzz-saw or trip-hammer. And for fear that those who demand realism on the stage may assume that this dentist is not worthy of patronage, I should add that his services can be obtained only by appointment and that many of his customers travel half way across a large city in order to avail themselves of his knowledge and skill.

Objection has also been offered, I believe, to the practice of a photoplay physician in leaving the instruments of his profession in a place where they could be examined by patients. This recalls a library discussion which I heard a few days ago. A woman was telling friends of the "horrible conduct" of a doctor, who, in attendance at a house where a visit of the stork was expected, "laid out a formidable collection of instruments of every sort on a table near the patient" with the result that "she was nearly frightened to death." The doctor was severely criticised for his "brutality," but the discussion of his conduct in this case developed that three or four other women in the company knew of similar cases involving other physicians. And thus what at first seemed to be unusual practice appeared, before the subject was exhausted, to be quite common. Bearing even more directly on the particular point involved in a recent criticism of a Vitagraph production, was a newspaper item carried a few weeks ago by one of the press associations. It told of a despondent patient cutting his throat with a knife taken from a case of instruments which the patient, while waiting for an interview, found on a table in a surgeon's office. Used in a photoplay, how would the censor view these bits of realism? Surely, if criticism continues its present strange course, the time must soon come when writers and producers will be expected to submit affidavits containing details of when, where and how the events occurred on which photoplays are based. The critics will shortly have the film-makers in a class with the circulation managers of newspapers, the cashiers of banks, the manufacturers of patent medicines and other criminals.

These illustrations have been cited, not by way of singling out particular criticisms of photoplays, but for the purpose of bringing such evidence to bear in support of our argument as will tend to show the folly of one man attempting to judge, out of his own limited experience, what the customs and practices, reasonable or otherwise, a.e of all men and all women in all the various activities and situations of modern life. The great trouble with our present-day photoplay critics is that they write "unnatural" when the should write "unusual" and that they frequently object purblindly both to actions that are unnatural and to situations that are unusual. Personally, I have long since ceased to believe in the impossibility, or even the improbability, of there having been many times enacted in real life almost any scene that the most versatile stage manager could devise. My opinion is that the more thoroughly we become acquainted with human nature the more undecided we are as to what constitutes the normal being. And even if there were definite information on this point, I would never tire of seeing those stage situations developed which the old-line dramatic critic and the average playgoer have long since come to accept as snatches, taken here and there, indiscriminately, from the great life-drama in which inconsistent, illogical, vacillating, self-contradicting men and women are the players.

The Passing Show.

By C. H. Claudy.

Sometimes you drop into a show and get ten dollars' worth for your five cents. Sometimes you go to laugh and remain to cry, less often, you go to cry and remain to laugh. Sometimes you just go to laugh and—don't!

But if you don't laugh when you see Kalem's "Money in the Bank," it will not be the fault of "Bertie," Kalem's new character, who succeeds in being a laughable, lovable, harum scarum college boy sort of chap, in spite of the farce-like characters he has to play. No, I heard no shrieks at "Money in the Bank," but the little lesson in human nature, of the sudden change of heart of a boarding house full of people, when they thought Bertie had money, was worth several nickels, and Bertie himself is well worth seeing.

"A little learning is a dangerous thing."—Pope.

There is much wisdom in the oft-quoted statement. The difference between the man who talks learnedly of what he knows little of, in the presence of an expert, and the moving picture producer who stages plays in environment of which he knows little, before audiences some members of which will know much, is one of degree and not of kind.

Pathe has produced a play called "A Broken Life," which, while much of melodrama is seen throughout, is consistent in plot, highly interesting, well photographed, and well acted. Yet it cannot be called convincing, because of certain things which are absolute falsehoods. For instance, where in Alaska is a "desert" in which a man may be lost and suffer presumable death and in which the absence of water is a calamity such as it would be on some of the alkali plains of the west? In the play, the hero is "held up" by a highwayman, who takes from him his canteen and pours out the water (for no reason that we can see, since he keeps the canteen and might as well keep the water too) and is thus supposed to have killed the hero. But hero lives, somehow and five years later reappears to find the highwayman has married his lady love who believes him dead. Where was he during those five years? In the desert?

* * *

When one combines this lack of truth with the showing of handkerchiefs full of gold nuggets, the bundles of such size that they would weigh pounds and pounds and which are handled as if very light, with men "panning" gold in a stream with a "panning" motion which would give a real prospector the shivers, with men standing bare-legged in an Alaskan stream (and streams in Alaska are bitter cold, even in summer, and this wasn't summer, for there was no foliage on the trees) one gets the impression that this is a carefully wrought play, not bad, and that the care has not extended to details. The pioneer scene happens to have been in Alaska at one time—a real, not sham prospector—and while we admire that man's moral courage we do not have many prospectors in these watching the screen to be sure enough men who know the North and mining ways will see this play to make more genuine details a real necessity if it is to make itself felt.

Vitagraph, in the "Trapper's Daughter," in addition to combining some very good and some very poor photography, makes a somewhat amusing act of erratic. Skiing is a legitimate method of travel over snow. But snow shoes, not skins, are generally used in the woods, on account of the difficulty of getting through underbrush with the long wooden runners. Here the hero and others go through dense woods on skis, and worse and worse, one of the characters carts a toboggan through the woods!

* * *

Two other glaring faults mar this otherwise well done play—the fact that the trapper had his hand caught in a wolf trap and couldn't get free (which, considering the size of the trap, is a rank impossibility—all he had to do was set his foot on the spring to release his hand fast as he would have set his foot on it to release the wolf) and the other was this—that the Indian who stole the girl and tied her to a tree, and was tracked down by the hero, was allowed to escape scot free by the highly indignant lover.

* * *

As mentioned, present scribe has been in the Northland. But even if he hailed from the equator, he fancies he would have wanted a little more revenge on any Indian who stole his girl and offered her such insult. He knows that any Northander would have shot him on sight. He is not a wisher for bloodshed in the films he sees, but he does like to see life portrayed as life is, and he ventures to say that not a man who saw that film but objected, in his heart, to the mild manners of the rescuer, in not doing something to that beast of an Indian!

Edison, in "Her Brother's Photo," has a play which interests from the start, and which is convincing all the way through, save for that one little spot which seems to be inherent in most photoplays, one little anachronism which won't go down!

In this play two men, friends, love one girl. Girl's brother is wild and woolly and is to be sent west to reform. Girl accepts one of her lovers, refuses the other.

At the club that night, the brother, having one more wild night before exile, is repulsed by the accepted lover, in disgust at his drunkenness, and falls, striking his head. Lover flees, in fear. Rejected Lover stays and sees that Brother is not dead. But he writes a letter to Accepted Lover, saying Brother is dead and bidding him fly the country.

Here is the "fly" in the ointment as well as in the letter. Would any man take so insane a chance of being found out a liar? Wouldn't he believe the chances at least even that the other man would stay and face the music, and thus find out the methods of the police? Would he believe that a bad days investigation would prove him a liar and forever remove him from the clubs, his society, intercourse with the best men and her friends?

But he doesn't. He accepts the letter and the accepted lover is so trusty a friend—thinking he has accidentally killed the brother of the girl he loves, that instead of staying and seeing the fun, and helping the girl thus her supposed friend, he flees!

Then he is surprised and heartbroken, although he has written her a short, good by forever" to bear, via newspaper, of her forthcoming engagement to his friend. So he gets mad and leaves all at once and goes back home again, where he sees a photograph of the brother at the ranch, and dated later than the letter from his friend saying the brother was dead. Whereupon he folds his lady in his arms and the friend is expelled from the house and all ends well.

But it was very convincingly acted, all the way through. Miss Trunelle being particularly effective, and easily conveying to the audience her grief and distaste for her life without her lover, without a couple but of heroics, tears or staggering across the room. Some day some one is going to write for her a perfectly stunning play, and Miss Trunelle is going to make the hit of the year, or I am much mistaken.

The film is a photoplay with two parts of its head, apparently, for sometimes these are quite apposite and dramatic impressions jar utterly against one another, as after seeing Inez Fiore at "string." Here a plot full of sequential situations so mixed with absolutely convincing and genuine acting on the part of the country lad who is accused of theft that I don't know whether to roast the plot or praise the man. However that may be, it is certain that the audience was highly interested and well grasped with the play, several scribe included. It "got over" in spite of its faults. The woman next me said, when it was finished, "I hope the next is a comedy, or I shall cry! Why do they put on those heart breakers?" which showed one person at least had been affected.

A country lad with a penchant for saving things, string in particular, is seen to pick up something, at the same time a man loses a pocketbook. The lad is accused of theft and every one believes him guilty, although he shows the string and tells of having picked it up. As a matter of fact, the loser of the pocketbook has a dog and the dog has carried the pocketbook off and hidden it, which is well shown—the dog was particularly good in his part!

Now, that every one should believe a lad guilty of theft, because he was seen to pick something up near where the pocketbook is supposed to be lost is very far-fetched—that his girl should turn against him is also hard to believe, but that his mother should think him a thief on such slight evidence, in spite of his protestations, and knowing his love of picking up and saving string, is preposterous. However between them all, they succeed in driving the lad crazy—and no wonder. And although you are left hanging in mid-air—since even after the pocketbook is recovered by the owner and his dog, many still believe him guilty, and although you don't know why the girl has a change of heart and restores him to reason by her love, you go away from this play with the feeling that you have looked at something real, even if, as said my next-of-seat "Oh why do they put on these heart breakers?"

Thanhouser's "Flames and Fortune" was a disappointment—and for the life of me I don't know why! I had heard of it and read of it and looked forward to seeing it, and so, I suppose, I had come to look upon it as something quite remarkable indeed, and when I found just a pretty little play with the usual rank spot, set off by a very splendid fire indeed, I suppose I was sort of dropped, suddenly, from the heights of expectation to the level of reality.

But I have not real right to be disappointed. The scenery is good, the photography excellent, the acting sincere, the house burns "really and truly" until there isn't anything left of it, and everything in the play is natural except—Oh, these exceptions. I shall have gray whiskers if I don't find a photoplay soon without any! Everything in the play went along smoothly and naturally except when the poor little girl, who has refused her rich lover because she doesn't like him, refuses her poor lover because she is poor. He, while apparently not rich, looks amply able to provide for her. But she won't injure him by marrying him because she is poor. She would much rather sacrifice herself and marry the rich suitor—otherwise she will be ejected from her home!

Well, this is the "except" plus the fact that, later, she, quite properly, gives the rich suitor his congé, and accepts the one she loves, and all without any apparent change in her fortunes except the burning down of her home, making her still poorer! Why, one wants to know, have an "except" like that when it would be so easy to do without it?

However! The little girl sets the house ablaze quite naturally, playing with forbidden matches, and is also rescued quite naturally, without too many heroics, by the lover who later gets the girl, after the Rich Suitor has refused to try for the rescue. And finally, after the fireworks are over, the innocent cause of all the mischief finds the old box of jewels, the hiding of which, in war time, and subsequent loss, by killing of the only person who knew where they were, forms the opening scene of the play.

Edison in "Heroes Three" puts out one of those farce-like funniments which really get the laughs; not infrequently (let us give credit where credit is due) to that sterling comedian whom I wish to know by no other name than Bumptious—Bumptious the fireman being my keenest recollection of him in this character, although Bumptious at the ball game certainly had points! Well, in Heroes Three "Bumptions," as I must still call him, and two other young men, wealthy and lazy, become volunteer firemen. The girls are crazy about them—until they go to a fire, and spend so much time in personal adornment that the house burns down before they get there. And when the three turn, tired from their labors, to find their three ladies fair in the arms of three of the despised civilians, the "heroes" promptly turn the hose on the lot, and the films end in a deluge of laughter and water together. Of course, it's all very foolish, and farcical, but it makes them laugh—and that is its raison d'etre.

I have an ungratified and probably never-to-be-gratified desire. I want to see John Bunny as a father and "Bumptious" as his son—give that pair the most teary "comedy" ever written and I would wager the hole in a doughnut against its rim, they get away with it!

Boston

The Bijou Dream Theater, Washington Street, owned by B. F. Keith, has entered into an agreement with the Boston Traveler Charitable Association, by which the Dream will donate to the society one-third of the gross receipts of its Wednesday business. These Wednesdays, beginning June 28, will be known as "Fresh Air Fund Days," as the money accumulated is to be used for vacations for poor children during the present summer. It cannot be doubted that many patrons of the Bijou Dream will make it a point to pay their visits to the house on Wednesday, as they will have the double satisfaction of not only viewing good pictures, but also of knowing that a substantial portion of their entrance fee is to be used for so worthy a benefit. And so we progress!

The South End Amusement Company has finally been organized after various attempts to form the corporation during the last year, and has now applied for a permit to erect a moving picture theater to be located at 1743 Washington Street, South End.

The St. James Theater is now really under way, as the work of razing Chickering Hall to make room for the proposed St. James Theater has begun. Only eighteen days are allowed for the razing of this building, according to the terms of the contract, signed by M. H. Gulesian, representing the St. James, and the R. R. McNutt Company, contractors. The real work on the theater itself is expected to start June 29; and it is hoped that the St. James will be completed by early fall.

Marcus Loew, Moving Picture King, paid a flying visit to Boston this week, and remained long enough to place orders amounting to many thousands of dollars for the extensive repairs and alterations to be made in the Columbia Theater this summer. The house is expected to open on Labor Day, featuring the Loew brand of junior vaudeville and pictures. Mr. Loew's Orpheum, of Boston, is doing a big business.

In these columns on July 1st it was noted how the Old South Theater was refused a Sunday night license owing to the trouble arising because of an improper vaudeville act used by the Old South manager. Nat Burgess, who was in complete charge of both the Old South and New Washington Theaters, has left his position, thus giving rise to the comment that this Sunday night license question was in some way connected with Mr. Burgess' departure from his two houses. However, this has not been confirmed as yet.

The Automatic Vaudeville Company, of New York, has made several changes in its managerial staffs at the various Boston houses operated by this company. Mr. H. I. Mosher, who had been managing the largest house, the New Palace, has left his position. Manager Wolf, formerly of the Comique, has taken Mr. Mosher's place at the Palace. Mr. Sam La Vange, formerly manager of the Premier, is now at the Comique Theater, Mr. Crosby Thompson taking Mr. La Vange's position at the Premier. The New Palace is now using W. E. Greene's Independent service and songs, with admission at five and ten cents, although, during the winter, considerable vaudeville is used with admission rates at ten and twenty cents. The Comique, on Tremont Row, is using W. E. Greene's Independent service and illustrated songs, with a flat ten-cent admission rate. The Premier, Washington Street, runs nearly the same shows as does the Comique, for only five cents, excepting Sundays and holidays. During the winter, the Premier runs at ten cents, but lowers its price to meet the very strong opposition of the Globe Theater, a "legitimate" house using "pop" vaudeville and Licensed reels, over the heated term.

HENRY.

"Captain Kate."

The Third of Selig's Great African Series.

After an interval of two months the Selig Co. followed the release of "Zululand" by "Back to the Primitive"; now it is announced that "Captain Kate" will be released July 13. This is the third of the series in which wild animals appear in their natural habitat during the development of the story, and just as it was told in advance that each of the Selig African series, as released, would excel its predecessor in thrills and sensationalism, so now it is repeated that "Captain Kate" will bear out the statement.

In this film we are introduced to scenes in tropical Africa in which the majestic black-maned lion is seen "catching" his prey, and where leopards prove their courage by attacking and killing a lion. We also see the operations of animal catchers in the dark country and watch with great interest the ensnaring of a leopard in a net and the craft with which a huge lion is lured to a pit, into which he falls helpless.

Through the whole absorbing story the grit and fearless faith of a girl, who is left alone for months amid the perils of African wilds, excites our admiration and sympathy.

As we view her in her frail log hut, with leopards as her household pets, and catch glimpses of skulking beasts of prey in the forest shades, or the graceful, majestic tread of the king of beasts in the open, our attention is held as vise-like grasp.

The acting, photography and technique of "Captain Kate" are admirable and worthily sustain the precedents of a compelling story.

Captain Kate is the young and intrepid daughter of an old animal trader in Africa. He makes his livelihood by catching, or purchasing, wild animals in regions where they abound, his helpers being Kadirs, who carry spears and shields of hide.

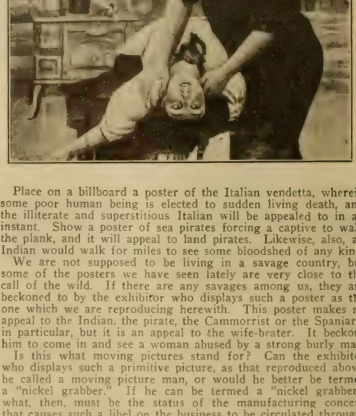
The opening scene shows the capture of a lion by means of lassoes, a very unusual method. We see the old trader in answer

An Appeal to the Savage

BY CORNELIUS O'SHEA.

It is to be noted, in comparing works of men, which appeal to other men, that the greater the amount of civilization attained by tribes or races or nations, the more delicate become their outward manifestations of their likes and dislikes. A man of refinement and education seldom fails to surround himself with good books and pictures. As a rule he is clean in mind and body. The lower down in the social scale we go, the less refinement there is to be found, until we arrive at the hut of the savage, where there is nothing but animal instinct.

Other things appeal to the savage than flowers and pretty pictures. He likes to see things killed and his effort at art are all in that direction. The graphic art of the Indian contains many arrows and tomahawks. The pirate shows as his emblem, his skull and cross-bones. The Italian sees much in the visible portrayal of a blood-dripping dager. The Spaniard loves to see a gory bull dragging its last miserable steps about the bull-pen. He glories in its death. A lithograph poster of a defenseless bull with its life blood dripping away, displayed in front of a photoplay theater would be the strongest kind of an attraction for the native Spaniard. It would be almost impossible for him to walk by a moving picture theater displaying such a poster without paying a nickel to go inside and see things he likes to see. We pity him, because we think he is a savage at heart.



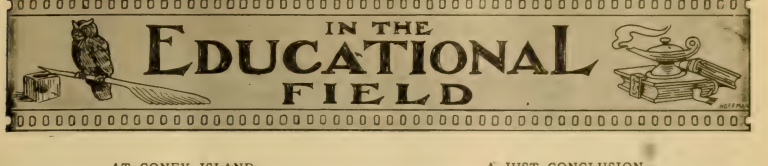
Place on a billboard a poster of the Italian vendetta, wherein some poor human being is elected to sudden living death, and the illiterate and superstitious Italian will be appealed to in an instant. Show a poster of sea pirates forcing a captive to walk the plank, and it will appeal to land pirates. Likewise, also, an Indian would walk for miles to see some bloodshed of any kind.

We are not supposed to be living in a savage country, but some of the posters we have seen lately are very close to the call of the wild. If there are any savages among us, they are beckoned to by the exhibitor who displays such a poster as the one which we are reproducing herewith. This poster makes no appeal to the Indian, the pirate, the Cammorrist or the Spaniard, in particular, but it is an appeal to the wife-brater. It beckons him to come in and see a woman abused by a strong burly man.

Is this what moving pictures stand for? Can the exhibitor who displays such a primitive picture, as that reproduced above, be called a moving picture man, or would he better be termed a "nickel grabber." If he can be termed a "nickel grabber," what, then, must be the status of the manufacturing concern that causes such a libel on the business to be circulated throughout the land? It is quite evident that such manufacturer is pandering to the savage side of human nature. He is appealing to the wife-beater, and yet, I have no doubt that he would be the first to bristle up with indignation if anybody told him that he did not know art from pickles.

A man who appeals to the savage instincts of the human race has no legitimate connection with such a great and good thing as the moving picture. He is a parasite; a scavenger, feeding upon the dregs of human perversion. I will leave it to the reader whether or not such a picture as the one shown herewith is one of the vilest things ever seen. Using the situation of a big brute of a man choking a frail woman over the edge of a table as a "come-on" for moving pictures is just about as low down as it is possible to go.

The Cypress Park Airdome, 138th Street and Cypress Avenue, Bronx, N. Y., is one of a chain of moving picture theaters under the management of Messrs. Knieriem & Moeling which will be opened about July 1st. It seats 2,500 and will give the latest Licensed pictures accompanied by suitable music eminating from a competent orchestra. Two machines and two operators are steadily on the job. For the convenience of the audiences, candy, ice cream sodas, sigars, etc., are served. Special attention will be given to ladies with baby carriages, which will be checked, free of charge, at their baby carriage garage. The airdome will begin showing pictures just as soon as twilight dawns upon us, and continue them until 11 o'clock, for the small admission price of five cents.



AT CONEY ISLAND.

Last year, under the title of the "Moving Pictures at the City of Fun," a review of the class of pictures presented to the public at Coney Island was described on these pages. The writer has again paid a skirmish visit to this famous resort for the purpose of noting what, if any, improvements have been made. At this early stage and with so slight an opportunity, comments can be made only upon the most glaring and superficial conditions which were noticeable. In the Ecomopoly picture resort discord was rampant, for while the poverty scene of "Tim Mahoney, the Scab" (Vitagraph) was upon the screen, showing Tim in despair and his haggard wife and hungry children in distress, the band was vigorously playing the "Star Spangled Banner." Again a wretched picture depicting the gruesome and unsightly beheading of Charles II of England was exhibited to the tune of a lively dance.

Every one knows that the ethics of Coney Island will not permit the blending of harmonies; it is the one place of all others where extremes must meet; in this respect they are masters unto perfection. Therefore it is only to be expected that dance music should accompany a murder, and patriotic prosperity wit hvictory, the scene of poverty and distress. Marvellous success must be accorded these efforts to bring dancing in death and hurrahs on an empty stomach. Grand Coney Island! Anything goes there—but the good. In another place, a picture of strong moral, lacking features in harmony with the moral killing surroundings, was the attraction; nowhere, in this brief visit, did the writer see anything worthy of the Moving Picture World; certainly nothing of an educational, or even refining, nature (these are not expected there); yet, it does seem as though it would be worth while having at least one place—even if managed by a film-producing firm—where something worthy of good moving pictures may be seen.

Educational Films.—Dr. William Augustus Evans, former Health Commissioner of Chicago, and officer in the American Medical Association, now holding a convention in Los Angeles, announces a series of health lectures, to be illustrated by a series of moving picture films taken recently in Chicago. Dr. Evans has given the same lectures in Chicago and elsewhere to appreciative audiences, who hastened to put his teachings into practice. Dr. Evans is authority for the statement that the Chicago mortality rate has been greatly decreased since the inauguration of proper machinery for conveying to the public better systems of living. Dr. Evans praises the motion pictures, especially those of an educational nature, and says that they have been a great help to him and other welfare workers in teaching the ignorant to better their condition and save human life. He says that the pictures have told in a very dramatic manner of the dangers of impure milk; what sanitary dairies have accomplished; of the dangers of unclean habitations; impure water supply; methods of caring for children, and a hundred other subjects. He says that Los Angeles is to be the second city in the United States to see the moving pictures given over to children's welfare. These films were taken at a recent children's welfare congress in Chicago, and show various methods of bringing up a child. In addition to the lectures and pictures, which are free, weekly bulletins of statistics will be published in the city's daily papers, and in foreign papers published in the city, in order to reach the people who need health education most. Dr. Evans has been in conference with Dr. Powers, City Health Officer, who is gladly cooperating with him in making an investigation of existing conditions. Los Angeles has gained the reputation of being one of the most healthful cities in the United States, despite the fact that the wonderful climate causes a tremendous influx of invalids in search of health. Dr. Evans believes that the already low mortality rate can be still further decreased by appropriate illustrated lectures and a generous use of publicity on sanitation and hygiene subjects.

A JUST CONCLUSION.

With calm judgment and deliberation the writer decided to study all pictures he saw during a whole year for the purpose of arriving at a mature decision relative to the need and cause for fair criticism. It must be pointed out that the last year has seen almost an entire elimination of the scurilous pictures which were destined to bring the moving pictures in deserved contempt. Of the remainder, which are classed upon an average as satisfactory, close scrutiny of the pictures and their effects upon the audience formed the writer's one year task. At this length of time every reader must concede that no conclusion could either be hasty, biased or unjust. While there has been a great toning down of everything leaning to the criminal, and while it has been plainly evident that the film producers have been giving evidences of their own educational growth, the crudity, voluptiousness and immodesty of love making continues. The love making, courtships, embracings and kissings are the one blot upon the pictures of to-day.

It is with a blush that one feels that these methods should be interpreted as characteristic of America. In England, France and Germany they would surely be received with feelings which would not increase a respect for American young people. The effect upon young people in their 'teens is extremely harmful, while the effect upon intelligent children is disastrous.

It is not necessary at this time to further enlarge upon this theme, all who are interested will receive this decision of one calmly and deliberately arrived at, and will further at the same time perhaps be pleased that to feel that the direful effects of earlier moving pictures have been reduced to this minimum; now let this also be eradicated, by the introduction of true natural and modest love-making.

A PLEA FOR THE BOYS.

Give us some pictures especially for the boys! If there are men who wish to see a reproduction of a prize-fight, it shall not be ours now to express any opinion relative to their taste. But we do say that a film portraying a series of champion baseball matches will be enthusiastically hailed by every boy in the United States. The athletic sports of the college campus will provide another series of attractive pictures, and perhaps draw many a youth to seek a life otherwise hidden to his view. When the outdoor life of the college is spread before him the youth may feel an impulse to seek a higher education; it is no wrong to climb to a higher sphere upon a ladder of amusements, especially when those amusements are of a physical advantage. Where are the Y. M. C. A. officials that they have not proved the advertising value of cinematography? Do they not know that the portrayal of the social and physical advantages will do more to fill their ranks and classes than the best member-enrolling competitions they ever put forth?

Pictures of boys—about boys—for boys! What a field of adventure, amusement, instruction and profit! A "Boys' Night" at the moving picture place will prove an incentive to all interested. Again to cater to boys is a safe proposition; there is always a distinctive and enabling objective in view, the attaining of which is in every way profitable.

May this call prove not to have been in vain. A field of suggestions and possibilities is here opened before the proper people to respond; may they do so with speed.

NOTES OF INTEREST.

Senator Grady, of Albany (N. Y.), has introduced a bill adding a new section to the general city law regulating theaters and nickelodeons in which the motion picture are exhibited. Before such places may be opened the owners must secure a certificate from the Mayor showing that fire extinguishers have been provided and that a fire proof curtain has been installed to protect the stage.

Dante's Divina "Commedia" In Moving Pictures.

By W. Stephen Bush.

Is it possible that presently the moving picture, the whilom despised handmaiden of the clown and the cowboy, will place within the reach of millions all the treasure, that now, but for a handful of scholars, lies untouched in the libraries of the world? Is it indeed true, that this heaven-sent invention will reveal to the masses of the people all the beauty, all the grandeur, all the sublime pictures and the no less sublime gospel of Dante?

Such news must at first fall upon incredulous ears, for though the subject had all the fascination of a work of the highest human genius the difficulties in the way of the film maker seemed insurmountable. In the first place Dante is hard to understand, even in our fine translation of Carey. To assimilate the great work well enough to picture it to others, required powers of no common kind. It must be remembered, that a perfectly correct transcription of Dante's original manuscript has not come down to us and that within comparatively few years after the immortal poet's death Italy's most famous university created a special chair for the interpretation of Dante and that the first to occupy that chair was none other than the second master of the Tuscan speech, Dante's great admirer, Boccaccio. In the course of the centuries there grew around the "Divina Commedia" such a bulk of books, that today only a large library could accommodate them all. Even now, when the scholarship of every civilized nation has made voluminous additions to all this bibliography, some of the most famous of the cantos contain scores of different readings of the same passage.

To loosen from this tangled mass the grand and solid features, then to construct for cinematographic reproduction a clear story, in which all the essential parts could find adequate rendering, presented a task of such magnitude, that even the boldest of film makers might with no discredit have recoiled from the attempt.

It is with sincere and emphatic pleasure that the MOVING PICTURE WORLD records the unqualified success of the filming of the "Divina Commedia," giving as its authority the unanimous opinion of the artistic, scientific and literary world of Italy. The great film, a product of the Milano Films Company, was shown for the first time in Naples before an audience, probably more distinguished than any that ever attended a moving picture exhibition before. Many representatives of the royal house, composers, artists and authors were present. The King of Italy is among the most ardent admirers of the film, having, with the Count of Turin, attended a private exhibition, which elicited from both gentlemen the highest commendations. The daily press of Naples gives as much space to the performance as it possibly could give to the most important item of art in the kingdom. Nor is this all. The papers selected for the attendance on the exhibition their most competent critics.

We quote from the columns of the "Il Giorno" March 3d of this year: "A fine and just proportion is observed in the film between action and expression . . . . nothing could have been more accurate and lifelike. Has then the film succeeded in portraying the various manifestations of Dante's muse? Yes—beyond a doubt. . . . It must also be stated, that the performance was repeatedly interrupted by applause and after the last scene was shown the applause was renewed from every part of the house. The scenes showing the unhappy fate of Francesca da Rimini, the circles of the City of Dis and the tragic sufferings of Ugolino and his sons were received with many exclamations, showing how profoundly the spectators had been moved." From another Neapolitan journal of the same date we learn, that all the incidents of the first canto of the Inferno, which is by far the best known, are reproduced "in their most minute details with settings so gorgeous, that it surpasses all previous efforts." It is also stated in this journal, that a special book of music had been arranged for the film by Signor Carvaglios, a composer of some note. The music was very favorably received and added greatly to the enjoyment. The theater, where the production was shown, was a playhouse of national repute, the "Teatro Mercadante." The Mayor and all the heads of the municipal departments were in the audience. Italy's foremost living composer, the great Mascagni, speaks in terms of unconditional praise of the merits of the film, as does that discriminating writer and critic, Matilde Serao, the authoress of "In the Country of Jesus." Another distinguished artist, who adds his meed of praise is Signor Roberto Bracco.

The film, it is understood, is now on its way to this country, and may arrive in a week or two. Some of the Italian papers, while lauding the product of the "Milano Films Company," speak in unflattering terms of another film, bearing the same title.

That this new work of film art will be very welcome to the American exhibitors, we have no manner of doubt. If the Italian comments and criticisms are to be depended upon, Dante's immortal work will rival the Passion Play. We have implicit faith in the correctness of the Italian estimate of the artistic merits and powers of the film. The press agent in Italy is a distinct exotic and could not thrive on the soil that has been hallowed by centuries of the life of noblest art. It is likewise a matter of great satisfaction, that this work was attempted and so finely carried out by Italians on Italian soil—that circumstance assured the greatest possible measure of success with such a subject. Our mercurial friends of France are perhaps just a bit too frivolous for that type of effort and we cannot repress a slight shudder at the thought of what might have been "accomplished" with such a subject by some of the film makers in England or even in our own beloved country.

In judging of the success of the film in Italy and drawing therefrom profitable comparisons for its future in this country, it should be borne in mind, that Italy's population, in spite of heroic work on the part of the government, is still not less than 60 per cent. illiterate and that in the southern portions of the kingdom, in Naples, in Calabria and Sicily, the percentage is probably 80. If under such handicaps the film has had a phenomenal run in Italy a prophecy of hope may be ventured for its fate here. The "federation of the film," that large domain, which like true art knows no geographical boundaries and has a strong international life, owes a debt to Italy for the production of this great masterpiece. Its uplifting influence will be felt in every corner of the world where the photoplay has its devotees.

It goes without saying, that the MOVING PICTURE WORLD will keep its readers informed of everything that, in connection with this film, may prove of benefit to them. If it should hereafter appear, that popular explanatory literature on the subject may be of advantage to the exhibitor it will be duly supplied. Further descriptions of the film in its more important details may also be looked for. The MOVING PICTURE WORLD will likewise publish, when the time comes, a very complete lecture. A suitable musical programme will be suggested and everything will be done to aid the exhibitor in making the most out of the film in every possible way.

For effective lithographic work we can suggest nothing better than the illustrations of Gustave Doré, which are very popular. For every reader of Dante you will find a hundred who have just looked at the artist's pictures. The book may be procured at small cost.

Words from the Watch-Tower.

To Directors and Near Directors

Hurrah for Melies!

For the second time within the year I have heard a motion picture audience absolutely howl, and yell with laughter—not modest little guffaws here and there, but a hearty, genuine outpouring of those peculiar sounds by which the human being indicates great joy.

The occasion was the exhibition of "When the Tables Turned," in which we are treated to a brand new variation of an old theme, and in which, if results are any criterion, Melies has achieved that rara avis—a film comedy which is genuinely funny.

An actress, tiring of her work, leaves it to chance—via a hatpin stuck in a directory of Western towns—as to where she will go for a change. The pin strikes in a town in which lives an Aunt of a certain Niece, who, coincidently with the unknown actress's determination to go there, writes Aunt a letter saying she, the niece, is coming on a visit, and wants to see the cowboys, although she, the Niece, considers them a pretty tame lot.

Aunt shows the letter to cowboys, who immediately plan revenge, to show they are not tame.

By a mistake, the actress gets off the train, but the niece is carried further on. Cowboys and stage driver, naturally take actress for the niece. Whereupon the cowboys chase the stage and scare the actress out of it, then chase her again as she runs wildly away, and finally one, swooping down upon her, lifts her bodily from the ground at full gallop and makes off with her.

Incidentally, let it be recorded here that Miss Storey manages to get swiped off the ground most artistically, and her cowboy capturer does a fine piece of riding in accomplishing the feat.

Well, the cowboys imprison the actress in a barn, and go outside to think of something to do next. She, frightened, but calm, listens, and discovers the plot. She plans revenge, and, removing wraps and letting down her hair, plays insane woman to the life. The cowboys, returning, think she has gone mad from fright. Whereupon the laugh becomes crescendo, and never abates. Miss Storey, as the "crazy" actress, alternates between offering her erstwhile tormentors sweet caresses and violently pulling their hair, and they appear a very much disturbed lot of men. Finally, while "loving" an unwilling victim, the actress snatches his revolver from his belt, holds up the entire outfit long enough for her to make the man she has disarmed relieve the rest of their fire-irons, and then, after making one cowboy fetch her a seat, she holds an impromptu circus at the point of the gun, and the obedient and thoroughly frightened cowboys play leapfrog, roll over and generally perform antics at her behest, while she alternates between fits of laughter, which are real enough but which the cowboys take to be other manifestations of her insanity, and a fierce scowl, which would terrify more than a held-up cowboy.

Meanwhile, the real niece arrives and is welcomed by her aunt. One cowboy manages to escape from the window, and tells them what is going on in the barn. They all come to see, where the niece comes upon the woman (the actress), with whom she has become friends on the train. Explanations are in order and, with a sweeping courtesy, the actress leaves the lot of fooled cowboys, who, after recovering from their stupefaction, fall upon the ringleader who suggested the game.

The film might well have ended there, but it doesn't. The two ladies—Niece and Actress—invite the cowboys to a "pink tea," where the revenge is complete, since tea is not to their liking.

I am sorry to say my synopsis doesn't read as funny as it it, but it was a genuine comedy and worth seeing and making, and is starred as one of the few really funny films which "comes across."

Incidentally, for the first time in many moons, I have seen Miss Storey in "dress-ed up" clothes. Poor lady, they don't give her much chance to wear anything but a shirtwaist, open at the throat, and a short skirt. That she puts over such convincing portrayals without any of the help fine feathers might give is but another tribute to her ability. And now that I've seen her in "store clothes," behold, I prefer her the other way. Not that she doesn't grace them—far from it. But the "cow girl," the rancher's wife, daughter, sister or sweetheart she usually is, is her familiar guise—long may she continue in the plain clothes and the sincere and honest portrayals of Western womanhood by which we of the audience know her.

One of the saddities (if I may coin the word) of the motion picture spectator is found in the film which tries to be and isn't. A producer gets hold of a good scenario, or invents a fine idea, and then falls down in the working out of it so glaringly that all truth is eliminated from it, and we, the audience, see merely a series of pictures which fail to portray what they are supposed to portray—pictures which make no appeal, arouse no feeling, show no life, because obviously pictures, not reality.

A case in point is Thanhouser's "The Coffin Ship." There was nothing the matter with this plot, but there was everything the matter with its treatment. A ship owner has a daughter, secretly married to the captain of one of his ships. The captain begs for repairs that the ship be not sent to sea in an unseaworthy condition, but the ship owner refuses. His daughter, unknowing of this, decides to stowaway on the ship to be with her husband, and leaves a note to tell her father. He, of course, is heart broken and very frightened now that is own loved one is on the ship he knows to be unsafe. The ship is found to leak, and supposedly sinks; the captain and his wife go off on a raft, the father finds in a newspaper the account of the loss of the ship and of his daughter on board and is broken hearted again; and when his daughter is restored to him, declares that never again shall a coffin ship leave his docks.

All right, as a plot, isn't it?

Now for the "breaks." To begin with, while the writer is no mariner, although he has had many experiences on shipboard, he nevertheless believes he is right in stating that captains of lumber-laden ships rarely, if ever, dress in uniform, and certainly sailors of such ships don't dress in navy uniforms!

However, passing this point up, he rises with this question —where would a captain take a ship owner to show him the unseaworthy condition of a hull? The answer for the answer When he gets it, it won't be the answer the film made—"on the deck, down between piles of laths!"

When a ship springs a leak at sea the crew may well be forgiven for being terrified. But when a ship springs a leak in water so quiet that not a ripple breaks its surface, let alone a wave, almost any crew would be reasonably certain of getting to shore, either by boats or spars or working the ship to land, which can't be more than a mile or two away. So that when we see the cowardly crew making off with the boats on what looks surprisingly like river water, though the camera is carefully pointed downwards so you don't see any shore, we are surprised, and we are still more startled when we see the captain desert part of his crew and escape on a raft with his bride, leaving said crew to flounder with the ship!

They "drift the whole night through" as the title tells us, and we see him supporting the girl and bathing her brow with sea water—why, dependent upon the land breeze, pretty, maybe. The raft is a pretty small raft and it's a good thing there were no waves, otherwise it would upset and these would have been no story. Still, they are in a bad fix, these young people, only we didn't think that it was so very bad when they were picked up the next morning. But the captain, very strong until rescued, collapses the moment on being brought over the rail, yet manfully recovers in time to help his wife over, regardless of their terrific experience of all night on a raft in perfectly quiet water and warm weather. What! How do I know the weather was warm?

Why, in what other kind of weather would one bathe one's wife's head in ice water?

We cannot even gain over the fact that Father arrived at the dock when the ship was not more than a couple of hundred yards away, but could get no boat to send after her and call her back, and we cannot forbear asking why was the captain, who escaped with his girl while all the rest were lost at sea, regarded as a hero and cheered?

The present scene has a knock to hand Selig on the spar they used in "Jim and Joe" recently, but he must speak up here and say that their wreck looked probable, since the boat was so violently tossing sea, and the spar floated in real waves. In fact the picture that one picture had a wrecked boat in waves, and the other a sinking ship in a flat calm, does the Selig picture (barring the absurd spar) beat the Thanhouser picture in point of fidelity to nature.

I would like Champion to inform me in what land—or what state or states in this land—the scene of "For Her Sin" is laid? Such delightful marriage laws and morals ought to be more universally known—one imagines that that state would be well peopled in a few days after the announcement of the laws was made public.

Two men love one girl. She thinks she loves one, and marries him. She finds out she is mistaken and leaves husband for his friend, becoming friend's mistress and living with him. Husband, broken hearted, leaves for the West and buys an interest in a ranch. After seven years he decides to marry the daughter of his partner. But this, being published in a paper, distresses Mrs. His Real Wife, who promptly leaves her lover, dropping him a note saying she is going back to her husband. He (the lover) in the meantime, has grown cold to her, of course.

Well, she arrives at the ranch just as the wedding ceremony is concluded, and there is an affecting scene (really well done, too) between the original wife and the husband and the newly-made wife, and the first wife goes back home, to her discarded lover, who promptly turns her out of doors, to find shelter at last with the Salvation Army.

Now then, if they were divorced, why did she want to go back to her "husband." If they were not divorced, how could the husband marry again? If they were divorced, what grounds had the wife for thinking the husband, whom she had last learned was going to remarry, would want to see her again? How does a woman leave her husband and go live with his friend, in the friend's house, same city, for seven years and not get wrecked by scandal? Why, anyway, build photoplays about women leaving their husbands to become the mistresses of friends, and husbands getting married again to nice girls without the formality of divorce? Why waste a thousand feet of film and some very capable actors and actresses on this kind of twaddle, anyway, and once more, why have an "interior" set for a railway station when real railway stations are so easy to come by?

Well, I know no producer cares a whit for what the individual thinks. But if the individual is numerous enough, they have to care. And the individuals who are sick unto death of the foreign idea of fun (in my city, at least) are getting some numerous. And if the audience's actions are any criterion, my city is not the only one. I was in Philadelphia recently and saw "Tweedledum and His Rescuer," by Ambrosio, and though I strained my ears I heard never the ghost of a chuckle. The film isn't worth the space to review. It is based on the idea that Tweedledum, by pretending to commit suicide, will invoke the pity of some one, who will feed and clothe him. This he does, and papa, mamma, and daughter "rescue" him. And for about ten minutes we sit and watch Tweedledum get clothes, an automobile (so he can run over a few apple carts and things), money and finally the man's daughter, simply by pretending he is going to kill himself. No, it isn't funny, and no one that I've seen (no one of these alleged funny foreign films which depend on impossibilities and running over people for their humor) has brought a laugh. If a comedy doesn't make people laugh or even want to laugh, what, in the name of Pierrot, is it good for?

Chicago Letter.

By James S. McQuade.

And now the ministers of the United Brethren have taken their fling at moving pictures. Out in Spokane, Wash., recently, at a conference of the Columbia River District, which includes Washington, Oregon and Idaho, the reverend gentlemen sought to start a crusade for the suppression of the moving picture shows in the city mentioned. But the movement failed to receive support or sympathy either from city officials or citizens.

As a result of the attempted suppression, the fourteen moving picture theaters in Spokane will continue to give their exhibitions without interference by those in authority.

It is estimated that the total weekly attendance at picture theaters in Spokane averages between 115,000 and 120,000, and that more than $500,000 is invested in picture theaters.

Every film exhibited in Spokane is first inspected by the police department, a special man being assigned each house by W. J. Doust, chief of police, who acts under Z. E. Hayden, commissioner of public safety. In connection with the action taken by the ministers of the United Brethren church against Spokane moving picture houses, Chief of Police Doust said:

"I visit the picture shows once or twice a week, and have yet to see a picture that I would not want my wife and daughters to look at. I think the moving picture shows fill a long felt want."

Commissioner Hayden declared his department had received no complaints about the pictures exhibited in Spokane. "The owners and operators of the houses respond to the orders of the police and there is not the least friction," said Mr. Hayden. "We will not stand for fight pictures, and the houses understand that ruling. Pictures of crime also are barred."

Mayor William J. Hindley, head of the commission, who Mayor Wm. J. Hindley, head of the commission, who was formerly pastor of the Pilgrim Congregational church, said:

"Properly inspected moving pictures are all right. The moving picture shows in Spokane, so far as I have heard, are running a clean line of pictures, to which I have heard no objection. The moving picture, as an instrument to convey a moral lesson, has great power. While at Seattle recently, I was agreeably surprised to see the Rev. Dr. Strong using moving pictures in connection with his sermon. It worked fine, and conveyed the lesson with a great deal more readiness than could be done by words alone. Control the picture shows and I have no fault to find with them."

Commissioners Fassett, Coates and Fairley expressed similar views, Mr. Coates saying he would offer no suggestion that would curtail the public use of moving pictures.

Dr. David Levine, rabbi of Emmanuel Congregation and head of the juvenile committee of the Child Welfare League, said:

"I can only speak for the pictures at one of the houses, which I visit regularly each week. There, I see, the pictures are inspected by the National Board of Censors, and all pictures so passed are acceptable. I have taken parties of children to this theater on the invitation of the manager and shall continue to do so. This thing of the picture shows inducing children to become spendthrifts is like anything else. Children can eat too much candy, become too vain, over dress, or do other harmful things, if we permit them."

Mrs. M. Evans, matron of the juvenile probation office, believes that good moving pictures have a decided moral influence. "The pictures appeal to the eye and the music to the ear," she said, "and in this way the lesson is conveyed much more readily than it would be by mere words.

"I have been in the charity work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union for twenty years, in which time I have seen hundreds of pictures, and I am candid to confess that I think the pictures do more good than harm. We take the little ones in the juvenile detention rooms to see the pictures occasionally."

What with the unjust discrimination of over-zealous moralists, the unfair municipal legislation in many cities, and the tendency of those in authority, in some places, to look upon exhibitors as legitimate prey, the picture theaters are under a continuous heavy fire. But the conflict is accomplishing great good. The moving picture, after going through this fiery furnace, is strong enough to win against all odds. And it is winning in a walk.

The most intelligent people are seeking the picture house for entertainment, and the only thing that prevents their attending in full numbers is the lack of worthy picture theaters. I mean structures worthy of high-class pictures that will offer the comforts and surroundings demanded by men and women of culture.

Family Drill.

The Quarrel of Son With Father.

If this film is run without effects, it will solve a great problem, to wit: how to have a sane and safe Fourth and not dispense with any of the patriotic excitement, which seems to be essential to a proper celebration of Independence Day. It is a reel which will set Young America wild and make the older folks think of their own way of celebrating in the days gone by. Enough Indians, soldiers and hardy pioneers are introduced to furnish forth a dozen ordinary Western films; there is the sorely beset log cabin of the backwoodsman, heroically defended by the members of a prolific family, who in days of peace have been enthusiastically drilled by the head of the family, an old soldier, in whom the fires of patriotism are burning somewhat thereby to arouse on the white hair. The eldest son of the pioneer demands permission to visit his sweetheart, which is denied. The visit to the sweetheart, of course, takes place on scheduled time, notwithstanding parental prohibition, and when the undutiful child wants to go back to the home he finds the door locked. He takes his banishment somewhat philosophically, but then, the presence of an extra stern parent may explain that. Riding about aimlessly through a most picturesque country-side he sees from afar an attack of Indians on the house of a white settler, and hastens back to warn his sweetheart and her family. And now events crowd each other with a rapidity that must even enthuse the most jaded. The struggle in the cabin furnishes all the suspense element one can possibly desire. After some minutes, which, of course, "seemed like days," the brave banished lad finds soldiers and they are stark riders every one of them and not afraid to show it. The changes in the picture, showing the situation as it must have appeared to the combatants in the valley, and the situation as it really was, with the soldiers riding like demons down the mountain gorge toward the blazing cottage, produced a thrilling effect and lessened somewhat the suspense, which up to that moment was well nigh unendurable. Many touches of humor and pathos are introduced, and altogether the film is a patriotic offering of the most acceptable variety.

With the Western Producers.

By Richard V. Spencer, Los Angeles.

Another New Producer to Enter California Field.—Los Angeles in the near future will be headquarters for a new independent producing company—the third projected within as many months. The new company, about to be incorporated under the State corporation laws, will be known as the Mary Pickford Motion Pictures Co. The company have established business offices in Los Angeles at 307-8-9 Wilcox Building. At the head of the corporation is a woman, Mrs. J. McDonald, the president of the new company. Other officers and directors are Henry Le Sage, vice-president; F. Linsey Smith, business manager; Wm. Browning, assistant business manager; Louis Le Sage, secretary. The company contemplate establishing a Los Angeles studio in the near future. For the present, they will produce only industrials and scenics, but later on it is their intention to form a stock company and put on comedy and drama exclusively. Southern California seems to have gone motion picture mad. On every side one hears of new producing companies projected, or already under way. The writer is informed from unquestionable sources that the first of September will see three more new producers, aside from those already mentioned in these columns, at work in Los Angeles and vicinity.

Mr. Sidney Ayres, formerly with the Burbank Stock Company, who last week joined the Selig Stock Company, has completed his first week working before the Selig camera, and says that he enjoys the work immensely. He is playing leads with the local stock company under the direction of Mr. Francis Boggs.

Co-Operative Film Mfg. Co. will begin daily work on their films about July 15th, and from that date on will put on two and three films per week. Carpenters and other laborers are now hard at work at the studio, 749-51 South Broadway, getting it ready for active studio work. The company expect to have their films in the market the middle of August.

Miss Betty Hart, who for a long time has been playing ingenué parts with the Selig Stock Co., has moved into her own bungalow, recently completed.

More Publicity.—The "Rounder," a local theatrical publication, announces that future issues will contain a page of gossip of the doings of the local moving picture producers and players. The "Rounder" is a weekly publication.

Selig's Yosemite Company.—Mr. James L. McGee, business manager of the Selig Coast Studio, says that reports and films received from the Northern company are excellent, and that the company are turning out excellent negatives, both dramatic and scenic. The Northern company is under the management and dramatic direction of Mr. Hobart Bosworth.

Major McGuire, Dick Turpin and D. H. McDonald, members of the local Selig Stock Company, have been transferred to the Yosemite Company, and left June 15th for the Valley.

Serious Accident to Local Player.—James A. Oliver, one of the newest recruits to the Pathe Stock Company, was recently the victim of a serious accident. While the Pathe Company were putting on an exterior scene in Griffith Park, near Los Angeles, Mr. Oliver's horse became frightened, took the bit in his teeth and ran away. A score of cowboys started in pursuit, yelling instructions to Mr. Oliver, who is quite elderly. Hart Hoxie soon overtook the runaway and brought it to a sudden halt. The abrupt halt threw Mr. Oliver from the horse, and in falling he was seriously injured. He was brought back to the city and a physician called; who, after an examination, discovered that the actor had three ribs broken. Mr. Oliver recently joined the company from the legitimate, where he has been playing for the past 47 years. The accident will confine him to his bed for at least a month.

Bison.—The Bison Company are making arrangements to go on a three months' trip to Bear Valley, near San Bernardino, Cal., in search of new scenic surroundings. The valley, and vicinity, is one of the most rugged and photographically beautiful in the entire Southwest, being in the heart of the snow-clad Sierras, near the headwaters of the Santa Ana river, and abounding in beautiful scenic settings. The full strength of the Bison Company, and a number of extra people, totalling about forty, will make the trip. The company are also taking 30 head of horses, a half-dozen brand new canoes now on the way from the East, and a carload or two of props, costumes, scenery, and other supplies. The company plan to leave July 10th, and will be gone three months.

Miss Lelia Noel, well known in California legitimate stock company circles, has recently joined the California Motion Pictures Mfg. Co. stock company at Long Beach, to play leading roles, and will be seen in the company's future productions.

Selig.—The Selig Local Stock Company, under the direction of Mr. Boggs, are putting on another big Selig marine story. The company will visit San Pedro, Los Angeles' harbor seaport, to take a series of marine views in the vicinity. They have chartered a two-masted sailing schooner and will put to sea to take several scenes of the story.

Pathe.—The Pathe stock company will take a trip to Catalina Island for several scenes of a story they are putting on. Work has been hampered the past few days by the failure to arrive of expected film shipments.

Selig Studio Improvements.—Beginning July 1st, the Selig management announce that a big force of men will be put to work enlarging the Selig local studio. The South end of the concrete retaining wall will be extended to C Street, and the two-story building now at the corner of C and Allesandro streets will be razed, and on the same corner a concrete office structure of mission design will be erected. The Selig local studio is now the most elaborate and complete of any of the coast studios, and when completed will compare favorably with any studio in the United States.

Miss Virgina Chester, well known in local moving picture circles, whose unfortunate illness has received the sympathy of local moving picture people, is quite recovered from her recent illness, and will soon go back to her work before the camera.

Litigation.—The case of the M. P. Patents Co. versus Fred Siegert and P. H. Berg, to have come to trial June 19th, has been set forward two weeks on the calendar by Judge Welborn, U. S. judge, before whom the case is being heard.

"Enoch Arden."—This beautiful two-reel Biograph masterpiece has been enthusiastically received at Los Angeles, being the first run feature at Clune's Broadway and Tully's Broadway, packing both houses at all evening performances and playing to exceptionally good business for the matinees. Local picture "fans," of a critical turn of mind, pronounce the films to be almost faultless in photography, acting, and direction, and this is praise indeed. For poetical beauty of conception and direction, this film has rarely been approached and never surpassed. It is one film of hundreds that the average picture patron could see twice or even three times, and still enjoy the repetition. Each and every member of the Biograph forces who took part in making the picture, from the managing director down to the least important employee, deserve the praise and approval that the film is now receiving, and will continue to receive until shelved by old age. As the sea coast and other exterior scenes in this film were photographed near Los Angeles, the writer being fortunate enough to be present when several of the scenes were taken.

SPECIALIZATION.

When the American Film Manufacturing Company announced that all releases would be Western cowboy film, it was the culmination of earnest thought and study as to what the public really liked in the great popular entertainment—MOTION PICTURES. Since the inauguration of this policy the rapid stride the American Company's product has made, in popular approval, demonstrates that in this case specialization has been productive of results.

The dramatic side of life on the range is limitless in its possibilities. Unrestrained by social usages the pioneer ranchman made their own laws and judged men by a standard of their own; they loved roving; they loved freedom; they were judged by instinct; and many an unwritten drama of love and hate, of bitter jealousy and intrigue were enacted on the old cattle trails, the only record of which lives in the memory of the taciturn, silent cowboys. Some of the best dramas we have produced have been obtained by our producers from this source. The amusements of the cowboy are limited, in a way, but there are many humorous situations which develop in the natural course of his work, and American comedy depicts his amusements in many laughable films.

The Yale Theater Company is erecting a beautiful new theater at 305 W. Broadway, Muskogee, Okla., to cost in the neighborhood of $10,000. When completed will have a seating capacity of 500, and will be equipped with a mirror screen, concrete operating room and new Edison Model B machines. Will use three reels of first run pictures and one high class vaudeville act each program. The management is undecided whether to use Independent or Licensed pictures.

In a conversation with a moving picture pianist the other day, he said: "Your letters are good enough so far as they go, but you can't really teach anybody to work up pictures. You might help some beginners, but one must be able to improvise to be successful in this kind of work. And you cannot teach improvisation."

Possibly not. I shall not attempt to repeat all our conversation, but here is the gist of my argument. In the first place, if my letters have been of any help to beginners (and I have been told by many that such is the case), they are worth while. We can all imagine, and many of us have experienced the bewilderment of the pianist when confronted with his first picture show after having been told by the manager to "work up the pictures." What shall he play—and where—and why? A good start along a definite line will give him a foundation to work upon, and once he begins to "feel his way," it is only a matter of time until he begins to apply more or less appropriate music to the various scenes and situations, providing, of course, that he is at all interested in the work. I will not deny that a gift for improvisation is a great help, but I do not think it is indispensable. In fact, I believe it is very much over rated by many who depend entirely upon extemporaneous playing. I heard not long ago a very clever lady who said she "couldn't compose a bar of music," but who, nevertheless, adapted music to the picture much better than the average "improvisor." She had a good memory (cultivated, she said) well stocked with a varied repertoire to which she was constantly adding. Many so-called improvisors are contented to play a lot of mediocre stuff which, while it may satisfy themselves, can scarcely be called musical. Sometimes the best thing they do is to introduce a popular song chorus whenever it is crowded in. I am not criticising the good extempore player nor finding fault with the introduction of song choruses, but I have no patience with those "know-it-alls" who can't see beyond their own narrow circle. I'll back a good memory any time against a poor improvisor.

And what is meant by the expression, "working up a picture"? Does any one remember the old story about the blind men who went to "shadow" what the elephant looked like? One of them got hold of the beast's trunk and declared the elephant was like a snake; another, who found the ear, insisted it was like a blanket; a third, with his arms around a leg, thought it resembled a tree more than anything else; while the fellow holding onto the tail said any fool could tell the elephant looked like a rope. Now, the question of "working up" pictures seems to have as many points of view as the blind men's ideas of the elephant. It depends upon which particular part of the beast you are embracing to the exclusion of all the others. I cannot see how anyone can be satisfied with playing interminable waltzes through any and all pictures with a bit of "shading" here and there. What reason is there for using a waltz for the groundwork in a classical picture for example? Say, an early Greek or Roman story laid in the days before waltzes were invented. "What's the difference?" said my friend when I put this question to him. There is this difference: you are suggesting something which is out of character with the atmosphere of the picture. For this reason it is incorrect, and one should not copy after another's "method" unless he has a respect for consistency. "Well, what would you play." All the music which is practical has been composed long since the days of ancient Greece or Rome." That is not the point. It is the suggestion conveyed by your music which counts—not the time of its composition. A Strauss waltz may antedate Verdi's march from "Aida," yet the waltz will suggest a modern dance while the bread match does not. Why should you play a rag two-step in a Chinese industrial picture? There is nothing in it to work up," you say. There you go again. The fetish "working up" is in danger of being overworked if we are not careful. What's the matter with a bit of Chinese descriptive music, even though it is an industrial picture. It sustains the atmosphere and adds variety to your program. This last is an important item with some managers who feature their music. I am told there are many managers who have a great deal to say as to the character of music accompanying their pictures. I know of some who insist on a straight concert program, regardless of what is being shown on the screen. The pianist is not always to blame for inappropriate music. But when he is given a free hand to "go ahead—play to the picture—no interference—just get results" it is worth a few minutes of that pianist's time to consider what is implied by "playing to the picture" or "working up the picture" or "applying appropriate music," or whatever name he chooses to give it. Is he going to be satisfied with a few waltzes, a couple of rags and a bunch of popular songs? If that is his idea of "working up' a picture, it certainly is not mine of "applying appropriate music."

I have been asked what particular "method" I would advocate. I answer: "None in particular, all in general." When music is applied with intelligence and reason, no other "system" is required. A number of years ago, an excellent French pantomime company came to this country and played in a few of the principal cities. (I may remark in parenthesis that since the advent of motion pictures and the public's growing familiarity with "silent drama," this pantomime company would probably be better appreciated here now than it was at that time.) At any rate, the accompanying music made a profound impression upon me, and when the photo-play came into vogue, it seemed to me that the best way to regard it from a musician's standpoint would be as a pantomime. I speak, of course, of those pictures which "tell a story"—i.e. dramatic pictures. The music was kept going all through the action of the play, or at least for the greater part of the time, but subdued, as a general rule. In the tense situations you were so interested in the spectacle as to wholly forget the music, and this is as it should be. In a theatrical play the music is not allowed to predominate to such an extent as to detract attention from the play to the orchestra; then, why should not the same thing apply to the photo-play as well? I think it does. Music is an accessory to the picture the same as it is to the spoken play. When the action becomes very marked, excited or violent, your music will swell in proportion, but, as a general rule the music should not be so loud as to divert the attention of the spectator from the picture. Like the accompanying music of a play, you miss it if it is not there, but you don't notice it when it is there.

The main trouble in trying to lay out any sort of plan for guidance is the impossibility of establishing definite rules. No matter what suggestions one has to offer, there are always exceptions to be found. The best we can say is "as a general rule, this or that is the case." The greater part of picture work is a matter for your own judgment.

FOREIGN NOTES OF INTEREST.

A number of extremely interesting moving pictures were shown recently to a gathering of distinguished scientists of Paris by M. L. V. Bonvillain, of the Pathé Freres Company. Among those present was M. Camille Flammarion, general secretary of the French Astronomical Society. Before any of the pictures all of which had been taken under the supervision of experts in science and cinematography, were exhibited M. Bonvillain made a little speech in which he said many bright and clever things that will bear repeating. Exhorting his distinguished audience to be indulgent in judging the films made under such extraordinary difficulties, he begged his hearers not to be too hasty with the word "error," but rather to substitute in its place the phrase "a difficulty not yet overcome." Five pictures were shown in all, dealing with different subjects. Among the most wonderful was the picture showing the growth of a flower, which seemed like the work of magic. M. Bonvillain explained that the pictures of the growing flower had been taken at the rate of 500 an hour and were reproduced at the rate of sixteen a second, and that represented 30 the image. An Englishman named Price showed some interesting pictures of the life in birds' nests, and M. Bonvillain explained in a very witty manner the different troubles and digestion which Mr. Price had to assume in order to secure his pictures.

QUESTIONS ON LAST WEEK'S LESSON.

(1) Explain, in detail, the phenomenon presented in Fig. 18.

(2) Why do the images increase in number as the angle of the mirrors becomes more acute?

(3) Explain phenomenon presented in Fig. 19.

(4) Why will there be no common point of focus for all rays when a spherical mirror is of large size?

(5) Why is point of focus farther from mirror in 1, Fig. 20, than when the rays are parallel?

(6) Explain why image appears smaller than object under conditions set forth in Fig. 21.

(7) Does the light travel from eye to object or vice versa?

(8) Explain why only ray E from tip of arrow (Fig. 21) reaches the eye C.

REFRACTION OF LIGHT.

Light travels in straight lines so long as it traverses medium of uniform density. In passing obliquely from a medium of one density to a medium of another density, however, it is bent more or less from its path, the divergence depending on the relative density and character of the two mediums and the angle at which the ray strikes the surface.

The following law holds good in all cases, viz.: when a light ray passes from a lighter to a denser medium it will be refracted from its path, the angle of incidence being always greater than the angle of refraction. Conversely when passing from a dense to a lighter medium the angle of incidence will be smaller than the angle of refraction.

In Fig. 22 a light ray A D enters a heavy block of glass at B, is refracted to path B C, leaves the glass at C, is re-refracted to E. D E F is normal to the surface of the glass, as is H G. A B E is the angle of incidence and B C F the angle of refraction. As the ray leaves the glass the angle of incidence as represented by B C H and the angle of refraction by G C E. Examination and measurement will demonstrate the before quoted rule to hold true in this illustration. It will also be observed that the ray travels an absolutely straight line so long as it remains in either medium.

The ratio of the sine of the angle of incidence to the sine of the angle of refraction is called the index of refraction of the medium under consideration. In other words, the number obtained by dividing the sine of the angle of incidence by the sine of the angle of refraction is called the index of refraction. This, however, is in all probability Greek to the average reader, therefore I will try to make it clear

In Fig. 23 we see a ray of light, Y Y, passing through glass X X X X, Y B C, being the angle of incidence and C E H the angle of refraction, G H being the normal. We draw a circle any size, as shown, using C as its center. Next we draw lines B D and A I parallel to surfaces of the glass. Line B D is the sine of the angle of incidence and line A I the sine of the angle of refraction. If we now measure lines B D and A I and divide the former by the latter, the result will be the index of refraction. One simple, important rule to remember, which has already been stated in different words, is: When light passes into a heavier medium, from a lighter one, as from air to glass or water, it is bent (refracted) toward the normal. When passing into a lighter, from a heavier medium, as from glass, or water into air, it is bent away from the normal. Keep in mind the fact that a "normal" is a line at right angles, in every direction, to the surface. In dealing with the normal and convex, concave or uneven surfaces, remember that the right angle does not and cannot apply to the whole surface, but only to the point at which the normal line reaches the surface. This matter of the normal must be grasped since it is of utmost importance in tracing refracted or reflected light-rays.

As one looks obliquely into a pool, or basin of water, the bottom appears nearer the surface than it really is. In other words, the water is deeper than it appears. This is explained in Fig. 24.

In considering Fig. 24 we must remember that light rays eminate from and travel toward the eye; not vice versa. Rays passing from rod C to the eye must leave the heavier medium (water) and enter a lighter one (air), being bent away from the normal in the process. The lower end of the rod therefore appears as at C instead of A, its true position. Any straight rod partly immersed in water, in position at angle to its surface, will appear thus. Place a marble into a basin in such position that it is just out of sight of the eye behind the vessel's rim. Now, without changing the position of the eye pour water into the dish and the marble will become visible.

This is also illustrated in Fig. 24, in which A is the eye, B the marble's true position and C its apparent position. The heavenly bodies are seen about one-half degree away from their true position, except those directly overhead, due to refraction of light in passing from inter-steller vacuum into the denser atmosphere. The nearer the horizon the planet, the greater the refraction of its light. Due to this cause we see the sun in the morning before it has actually risen above the horizon and see it at evening after it has really passed below the distant hills. This phenomenon is called astronomical refraction. Seeing the rising sun doesn't, of course, apply to showmen. This phenomenon (refraction) is caused by the varying speeds of light in mediums of different density. The denser the medium the slower the speed of the light. The accepted theory is that light travels in waves and the reason for its refraction when passing from one medium to another

In the figure we see a light ray, A B, represented by the central, waving line, but, for the purpose of examination, given the width C D. The cross lines represent the wave front. In considering this matter you must remember the prodigious speed of light, also that the ray represented by line A B has been enormously magnified to cross section C D. Keep these two facts firmly fixed in your mind. Knowing that light travels slower in a dense medium such as glass than it does in a rare medium such as air, we readily understand that when a ray strikes glass obliquely one side of it enters sooner than the other. The upper side of the ray, Fig. 25, impinges upon and enters the glass at F and travels to H in that medium before the other side reaches the glass. Naturally that side of the ray has been retarded, as shown by the bent wave-lines, hence the direction has been changed as shown. In leaving the glass and re-entering air the process is exactly reversed and, if the two sides of the glass be exactly parallel, the original angle of incidence C G I and the final angle of refraction J K L will be exactly equal, the ray being finally refracted to exactly its original direction, but distance to one side dependent on the thickness and refractive index of the glass and the angle at which it was originally encountered. It might be said at this point that the refractive index of glass is said to be 1½. As I understand the matter, however, this is the constant, for ordinary glass such as plate glass windows are composed of and varies somewhat with different grades of glass.

125-Cycle Fan.—Brunswick, Ga., writes: "All operators seem to come to you with their troubles, so I am coming with one of mine. I own and operate the Pastime Theater here, and have been endeavoring to secure an exhaust fan from all those who carry ads in your paper. Our current here, however, is unusual, viz.: 110 volts, 125 cycles. For this reason I have been unable to get a fan. If you can put me in touch with a manufacturer who makes fans of 125 cycles, same will be greatly appreciated. Wish all success to your superb paper, which I would not be without."

Fans for 125 cycles, I am afraid, will have to be made to order. I have requested a large manufacturer to take the matter up with you by mail immediately. We are pleased to know that you like the "Moving Picture World," and trust it will continue to merit your esteem in the future, as in the past.

Nice Theater.—Albuquerque, N. M., writes, sending in the names of two friends whom he thinks capable of holding the Oklahoma positions, and continues: "I am electrician and operator in the Pastime Theater. It is one of the best picture houses in the good old U. S. A. Seating capacity is 550; Motiograph machine; we project our picture 115 feet; have a motor-generator which furnishes D. C. for the arcs. Have a switchboard with four double-pole double-throw switches, and if the generator goes wrong I just switch over on 110 volt lighting circuit."

Glad to hear the good report from Albuquerque. By the way, if you know the address of Mr. W. B. Cozart, we, I believe, is running a show somewhere in New Mexico, I would like to have the same. He is an old friend for whom I operated in Chicago. As to the Oklahoma positions, enough applications have already been sent the gentlemen to fill the five jobs a very great many times over. Sending more would be of no use at this late day.

Single Arc Dissolver.—Portland, Ore., writes: "Will you kindly tell me how I may rig up a dissolver on one lamp by the use of mirrors?"

You are asking considerable in one short question, Friend Portland. To date, I know of no one-lamp dissolver working successfully by the use of mirrors, although experiments are going on looking to the accomplishment of that end here in New York at this time. In the near future you will find an illustration of a single arc dissolver manufactured by Eberhard Schneider, 219 2d Avenue, New York.

Slack Work in Frisco.—President W. G. Woods, of the San Francisco Union, writes: "I am very much obliged to you for forwarding our offer of the five men to the Oklahoma party. These men will be backed morally and financially by this union, and this is no light boast, since every man placed by the executive board of this organization is guaranteed to the house in a financial way. This is the first time we have been in position to supply men out of this vicinity, though we have had many requests, as our members have a reputation as to capability. Things are, however, very dull here just now. In fact, there is a change in business taking place, such as has taken place in the East, the business going to the big houses having large capacity, which puts the smaller ones around it out of business. Then, too, we had a fire, which wiped out five houses at one swipe."

I have quoted these excerpts from Brother Woods' letter for the reason that it shows the possibilities of thorough organization. The San Francisco men have been very careful in maintaining the standard of excellence in projection by their members. Apprentices are taught and the union maintains, as I understand it, a demonstration room both for the benefit of their own members and apprentices. They are now in a position to even go to the extent of financially guaranteeing their members, which means that employers to whom members of the San Francisco Union are sent are guaranteed from any financial loss through the incompetency of the operator. If I am stating this wrongly, I would be glad to have President Woods correct me. The point is that this is a very excellent position for any operator's union to occupy. An organization composed of men that can be backed up in this way is indeed one to be proud of. I most sincerely congratulate the San Francisco Union on having attained such a standard of excellence. As to the change now taking place, the editor of this department predicted it more than three years ago.

Buying Ideas.—Cincinnati, Ohio, writes: "I would like to know if there is any company willing to buy an idea and a model (part cash and part royalty basis) of an adjustable spot light. It can be put on the projection machine lamp house, does not occupy more than 3 x 3 x 3 inches of space, and may be adjusted while in use to throw a spot through stereopticon lens, ranging from 1 to 6 feet in diameter. Kindly answer in the Department, of which I am a constant reader."

That, Cincinnati, is a very hard question to answer intelligently. As a general proposition, it is an exceedingly difficult thing to sell ideas in the embryo. The only practical method of procedure is to first patent the idea and then to offer it for sale. It is possible that some of the companies might purchase it, provided it appears to be worthy the added expense of attaching it to the machine. Also, as a general proposition, manufacturers do not care to add anything not absolutely necessary to their present machine. The reason for this is that they are already giving as much or more than they can afford at the present price of machines. You must understand that while a machine may be listed at $225, that does not mean that the manufacturer gets $225, by a long jump. As a matter of fact, the actual price received by the manufacturer is far below that sum. The real trouble is, machines are too cheap. I have pointed out before that it would be a very distinct gain to the business, as a whole, if the price of machines could be raised to $300, or even to $350. Then we could have a really high-class projector, and these various things, such as you are proposing, could be attached. If you care to take the chances, you could send your model to one of the manufacturers before patenting, but you do so, of course, by taking your own chances in doing this. I do not mean to insinuate by this that anyone would treat you unfairly, nor do I believe they would; still, the safest way is to protect yourself, if you think the idea is commercially valuable. On that point I could pass no decided opinion without first inspecting and testing the device.

An Inquiry.—Princeton, N. J., asks if there is an operators' strike in New York. Says he saw an advertisement in the New York World (daily paper) for moving picture operators to take the place of men on a strike.

No, there is no strike of operators in New York, nor has there been recently. Possibly the advertisement was for men to go to Cleveland, in which place the operators are, or were, on a strike.

Adequate Plant.—Mr. John Guthrie, manager Empire Theater, Grove City, Pa., writes: "Thinking your readers might be interested in a description of my power plant, I am going to describe it briefly and if you think the same worthy of space in the Trouble Department you are at liberty to use it. The plant consists of a 20-h.p. engine, belted to a 125-volt D. C. generator of 20 K. W. capacity. I have this outfit located in the rear of the theater basement and directly under the stage. The engine is of the two-cycle type, speed, 190 r. p. m. Exhaust pipe leads downward and under the cement floor, through inner wall of building to a pit outside. Pit has an outlet into the sewer from its bottom, to drain it; also an outlet at the top. Cooling water after leaving the cylinder jacket is sprayed into the exhaust pipe, doing away with the heat and also assisting in muffling the exhaust. I speak of this because a noisy gas engine doesn't add to the attraction of a theater. The sound of our engine does not reach the auditorium of the theater at all. First cost of the engine was approximately $900. It has been in use about four years, and the total cost for repairs has not been more than $25. There are other connections for current supply, depending on this plant entirely, and during the four years have not had to shut the show down a single night so as to connect us to it. I have no engineer. I require my operator and other help to become familiar with the engine and not wait for a fully trained engineer to look for it in advance. The plant is gone over every day before the run starts. The engine is started and seldom looked at again until time to shut down for the night; in fact, but at times it will run for hours with no one near it. The governor is one I picked up second hand. As rated capacity, it will outpull more than the rated horse power of the engine. I first had one that was a trifle light for the work and the trouble I had with sparking and heating caused me to look for a good brass dynamo. With the present machine I am glad to say that I do not know what governor trouble is.

The plant is carrying one part of flaming arc lamps, one 6-light 220 volt motor, 20 100-watt tungsten lamps, 30 60-watt tungsten lamps, 30 16-c.p. and 12 32-c.p. carbon lamps, motor for picture machine, motor for auxetophone and one or two other fan motors besides using about 35 amperes for the picture machine arc. We have all the power we want and never think of how to save it. When not burning in fresh carbons, the ammeter on main switch board often draws as high as 110 amperes, which would be more than the rated horse power of the engine, but it seems to pull the load without any trouble. We use natural gas at 25 cents per thousand net. The monthly gas bill is usually about $15. The engine is a 'Besemer' and I am not recommending any particular type of gas engine, this one does the business for us. Besides being simple and easily cared for, it runs as steadily as a steam engine. Of all the gas engines I have seen running electric plants, I believe this one to be the best adapted for the man who wants a moving picture power plant which can be relied upon to deliver the goods. The satisfaction I have had with my plant is, I believe, however, due mainly to the fact that it is big enough to carry the load expected. I would not advise any moving picture man to invest in a plant unless he got both a dynamo and engine a little larger in capacity than the actual load. This is especially true of the dynamo."

Neighbor Guthrie speaks words of wisdom when he advises the purchase of a plant with capacity considerably in excess of the demands which will be made upon it. Particularly as he says, this is true of the dynamo. I have spoken of this point in the Department several times myself. For Friend Guthrie's information I will say that a good engine should be able to carry a load considerably in excess of its rated capacity, at least for a time. We are indeed obliged to the correspondent for the description of his plant. Such things are of distinct value to managers all over the country. As time goes on, I believe there will be an increased tendency on the part of owners of large moving picture theaters to install their own generating plant. In many instances where two or three theaters are located close together the installation of a joint plant would be entirely practical and mutually satisfactory. There is ample evidence that with fuel at reasonable cost, a properly constructed and rightly managed isolated plant can be made to deliver current as low as 3 cents per K. W. hour. It is possible that even this figure may be reduced in some instances, though I have no record at hand of anything less than the figure named.

The Arc Question.—Professor Henry Phelps Gage, of Cornell University, one of the expert electricians who has made tests of arc lights for large corporations and who recently furnished us with an article on electric arcs, promised me sometime back that he would make certain tests as regards alleged tendency of the crater to form on the forward edges of the carbon with alternating current. I impressed the fact upon Professor Gage that it was the truth of the matter I wanted, regardless of whether it showed Mr. Hallberg right and myself wrong, or the opposite. His experiments seem to show Mr. Hallberg to some extent theoretically right and myself probably right so far as the practical end be concerned, therefore I am willing to call the honors even, though it is practical things I write of and am mostly interested in. A letter from Mr. Gage, just received, reads as follows:

"Dear Mr. Richardson: I suppose you will think I am a little bit slow in finding out about the carbon setting we were talking of. I tried the vertical setting, just as near to the directions given by Mr. Hallberg as I could come with 55 volts and 50 amperes, and certainly got a tendency, with a long arc, for the arc to blow away from the direction of the lead wires. The direction of blow was changed as the lead wires were carried around in a circle, being always away from them, as would be expected in theory. Also the blow was stronger when the wires were brought close to the arc. The blow effect did not show as strongly with a short arc as a long one. When using a short arc such as is used with moving pictures the tendency of the craters to face forwards did not seem very strong. When one lead wire was carried around in a circle there was enough blow to cause the craters to face forwards. Also a blow magnet has the same effect. There is absolutely no doubt, I am certain, that if the craters can be made to face forward by some device that is perfectly reliable that this is the proper thing to do. If the craters are near together there will be no trouble from two images.

Now as far as my experiments have gone they indicate that the forward position of the craters will occur on a current of not less than 50 amperes, the blow effect increases (theoretically) as the square of the current.

Without other helps, such as blow magnets, 50 amperes is more than sufficient to cause the craters to face forward with certainty when using a short arc. "Electra" and "Columbia" projector, 5/8-inch carbons used. 55 volts, 50 amps with resistance used.

Recently I have been thinking about just what should be the illumination on the screen. Last summer I made some experiments which seemed to show that if the screen were illuminated with a brightness of 50 candle meters (or, as ususally expressed, about 5-foot candles), with no slide in the lantern; then when the slide was put in, the picture would be satisfactorily bright.

The trouble is, what is to be considered satisfactory brightness? Of course with the moving picture machine the bright flashes would need to be about twice as bright as the steady light from the ordinary stereopticon. If this one point could be settled, I have the data showing just what must be done with the other parts: arc lamp, condenser, etc., to get the proper illumination on the screen for any given size picture. The only way I can think of to settle this point would be for a number of men, who have had a good deal of experience in the moving picture business, to get together and adjust the brightness of the screen image until it appears satisfactory to them (with a film in the machine) and then to take out the film and measure the brightness of the light. Another method would be to visit actual theaters, measure the illumination and comment on same. I believe, however, the judgment of several people should be used.

To get this light (5-foot candles) should not require such a high amperage as is often used if the condenser is right, it seems to me.

There is another thing about the condenser which seems to me very important, viz.: it should have but little spherical abberation. The result of spherical abberation is to illuminate the edges of the picture more than the center, the practical result being a ghost in the center of the picture. This may be avoided by moving the position of the condenser in relation to the film, but this necessitates illuminating an area much larger than that of the aperture plate. This same condition is very troublesome in microscopic projection. At present I am investigating this phenomenon and trying to discover a remedy. Your articles on light appeal to me as being very plain and to the point. Why is it that so many people have difficulty in explaining a thing so that any but experts can understand it? I guess the only way to get a clear explanation of a thing is for someone to try it who knows the difficulties his readers are likely to have in understanding the subject." HENRY PHELPS GAGE.

While I am prepared to accept the result of any experiment made by Professor Gage as conclusive, still it is something of a wrench to force my mind to agree to the proposition of the exceedingly weak electric action of the two lead wires having any perceptible action on the arc itself. While Professor Gage's experiments prove there is in slight degree such action, I am still very much in doubt as to its being of any practical use whatever in projection. It is a well known fact that an electro-magnet placed in a certain position near the arc will force the arc out in the form of a bow, thus, to some extent, controlling the craters. This, however, has long since been tried out in practice and rejected. The writer himself has made a good many experiments, some of them years ago, with magnets in conjunction with the arc. The difficulty encountered has proven to be that the fluctuations of current present in a hand-fed projection arc are such that the electro-magnetic force is at times too strong and blows the arc out entirely, or at least renders it very unstable and hard to control. We are, nevertheless, obliged to Professor Gage for having set forth the results of his experiments. It has proven the writer to be wrong in one thing. I did not believe lead wires could possibly have any effect at all on the arc. So far as the establishment of a standard of illumination of screen is concerned, I very much doubt if such a thing would be practical, for several reasons, viz.: (a) Out of twenty-five moving picture operators or managers, you will probably find at least twenty different opinions as to what is the best and most perfect degree of curtain brilliancy. (b) Curtain brilliancy will necessarily, to a considerable extent, vary with the size of the picture projected. For instance, if a certain standard of brilliancy be established and this brilliancy could be maintained at all times on a 12-foot picture, it would probably be a physical impossibility to maintain the same degree of illumination on a picture 22 feet wide. Nevertheless, we shall be very glad indeed to hear from the readers of this department, both managers and operators, as to their views concerning this matter. If any standard can be established, or, in other words, if any considerable number of men favor a certain curtain result in brilliancy, it might have a tendency to establish some sort of an approximate standard which could be adhered to as nearly as possible. In the matter of condensers, Professor Gage has touched upon a point on which I have long sought some explanation, and that is the matter of ghost in the center of the picture. Of late I have searched high and low for an explanation of this phenomenon. If it is indeed due to spherical aberration, the bit of information will prove of immense value. As to the last paragraph of Professor Gage's letter, it seems to be a tremendously difficult thing for the average man to put himself in the other fellow's place and realize the difficulties the reader is likely to have in understanding an involved explanation full, perhaps, of technical terms. I believe my readers will agree that they have at least been able to understand what I was talking about when I have tried to explain something to them.

An Interesting Letter.—Brownsville, Tex., writes as follows: "I am a constant reader of the 'World' and also have your Handbook, which I hold in high esteem. I have a partner who is assisting in the managing part of the business, which allows me to devote a good portion of my time to the study of projection. I find the same to be quite a science and am as much of a crank concerning it as I have been in my former profession, namely, watchmaker and jeweler. When reading your valuable articles in the 'World' I am often amused at so many operators having difficulty with their shutters. Two-wing shutters produce too much flicker, while three-wing shutters, when they run close to 80 feet per minute (which, however, is excessive), get in synchronism with 60 cycle A. C. I do not like either, but much prefer, and am using with most excellent results, a one-wing shutter. This is made of brass, of a circular disc 3 inches in diameter and well counterbalanced, running immediately in front of the film, thus obviating all disadvantage of shutting off the light a distance in front of the lens. The movement of the shutter is one to six. With this system I can show an absolutely flickerless picture 12 feet in diameter at a distance of 40 feet, which cannot be done with any other machine in existence. I am, however, using a throw 50 feet and when a light is thrown on the screen through a film with machine running, no flicker whatsoever appears. I am using a motor directly geared to the mechanism, but which can be lifted out of the gear instantly by turning it over. This, together with two speed controllers in series, gives me all possible required variations of speed. The apparatus, which is a Kammis patent Maltese cross projector, adapts itself to any focus lens without the use of lengthening tubes or any other arrangement. The arrangement of the shutter is somewhat similar to that of the American Edengraph. The gate of the projector also is a great improvement, in that it is of solid construction and the film runners made of hardened cast steel in one piece with a picture shield. This insures absolute durability. The picture mask and runners can be removed by unscrewing one milled nut. The film passes under two steel runners, which bear on it evenly during its passage through the gate. Mounted on each runner is a spring which enables the pressure to remain equal even when a thick joint is passed through. The pressure of these runners can be adjusted while the machine is in operation, if required, which is very frequently the case, since film varies considerably in thickness. With these runners also the wear and tear on the film is much less, since the pressure is fully distributed throughout the entire length of the gate. Neither myself nor any other person who has viewed its work here has ever seen a projection equal to that furnished by this machine. The lamp is built to carry a current of 120 amperes, though I never use over 40 D. C. It has a very simple but positive working device for moving the carbon tips forward or backward while running, and I have found this to be quite important. With this machine, defects in photography, such as uneven developments, and worst of all, peculiar flashing of light in certain parts of pictures due, I believe, to the shutters of the camera being out of time or to an unsteady light, are very conspicuous. I do not see why producers cannot use a little more care in examining their cameras or regulating the light before taking pictures. This is especially true with the Vitagraph, Lubin and Selig. They commit these mistakes, despite their otherwise splendid photography and very excellent acting. I also wish to say that I object to the Biograph and several of the Independent companies so absurdly misrepresenting the characters of the Mexican Senorita, and to their exaggeration of the behavior of Mexicans in general. Certainly they have never studied Mexico, or have only seen people of the lowest class. I wish to extend my thanks for the benefit I have received through the 'World.'"

The standard machine, Brownsville, has a shutter which is the half of a circular disc, that it travels around the circle twice to each exposure of the picture. I do not quite understand what you mean by the shutter having a movement of one in six. Surely you cannot mean the shutter travels six times around to each exposure of the picture. As to the projector you name, I have never seen one, but your description sounds good. The steel shoe idea is excellent and is gradually being adopted by some of our American machine manufacturers. I have long contended that the thin, lumber tension spring is not only unsuitable to the work, but is a distinct nuisance. The absolutely rigid thick shoe or runner is, to my way of thinking, far better from any and every point of view. It is easier on the film, doesn't wear out itself or the aperture plate so rapidly, and more important than all, distributes the pressure evenly over the entire length of the plate, thus obviating, to a large extent, the tendency of the film to buckle as it passes through the hollow invariably worn by the short limber springs. I have set forth the faults in photography you have mentioned because, like you, I believe there is at times carelessness both in acting, exposure and development of films.

From San Antonio.—San Antonio writes: "The condition of affairs here in San Antonio in the projection line is bad. What with the $8 and $10 a week Mexicans at the throttle it is simply beyond recall."

I have had similar reports from San Antonio before and it seems a shame that projection should have been placed on so low a plane in your beautiful city. It is a surprising matter that the managers of San Antonio do not awake to the fact that they are killing the goose that lays the golden egg. Projection in many other cities has been constantly improving and with the improvement increased business has resulted. The up-to-date moving picture theater manager well knows that the day of amusing an audience with a bunch of shadows on the screen is rapidly passing. He is awakening to the fact also that good projection means added dollars in the box office. San Antonio should get busy and keep up with the procession. If the managers of that city do not do so, it is only a question of time until other managers will seize the opportunity presented. This has proven the case in a great many cities and will prove the fact there also.

Anadarko, Okla., writes: "Some time ago you published the cut of a letterhead. The letterhead was excellent with the exception of one thing. It said 'for my own repair work.' Well, would any man call himself an operator if he could not do his own repair work. If I were he I would obliterate that particular part of the otherwise excellent heading."

I do not agree with you in the criticism of the brother's letterhead. Taking one operator with another, the country over, I doubt if you will find one in ten competent to do all his own repair work, even though provided with the facilities. The standard of operating is being raised day by day. The men beginning to study are rapidly becoming settled informed. There is still very, very much to learn this direction, however, before anything even approaching perfection will have been attained.

Motor Generator Set.—Louisville, Ky., writes: "I am enclosing two photos of my machine room, also a wiring diagram of same. You will notice that I am using a motor generator set, which I purchased from the Interstate Electric Company. This has been installed and running for six weeks and so far has given perfect satisfaction. The light is as fine as I have ever seen it in the talk of the town. I am using a dissolving outfit and had some lighting to make it work satisfactorily. It is doing splendidly now. First of all, I tried to run the arcs in series, but found that the voltage was not high enough to carry two arcs. Then I tried to run them in parallel without resistance, but found that the lamps would not burn together as one would take all the current. Finally I built a small resistance and hooked up as you see in the diagram. I put a single pole switch across the lower lamp resistance which, when closed, shunts out the resistance. I find now that I have an easy method of controlling both lamps. When I am through using dis-solver (I always bring the last slide on upper lamp) I pull lower lamp over for moving picture work and all I have to do is throw in the single pole switch. This cuts out all resistance in the bottom circuit and automatically cuts out top lamp by taking all the 'juice.' I like the rotary (or motor-generator set) much better than a rectifier, as there is no pulsation. The motor, of course, is an induction. The generator is a bi-polar, shunt-wound machine. Although only called a 1¼ K. W., which at 50 volts gives, of course, 25 amperes, I find that it will give me up to 35 amperes for 2½ hours without getting warm, and I believe would stand a further overload if necessary. Should any of your readers wish to know further particulars they may address 'Manager, Princess Theater, Leadville, Col.,' and I shall be only too glad to give any information I can.

"I am using two different dissolvers, one a 'fade-away' out of focus, and the other a rolling effect, which is in focus, and use them one evening each. With regard to operating room, I am proud to say that everything in it was installed by myself, even to the metal lining, and the switchboard (of 1-inch marble) was made, drilled, bussed and put up by myself, nobody else having put an inch of wire in the room. The two views were taken from opposite sides (or front and back) of the booth and were taken by flash light. I notice in a recent number of the 'World' you say that 70 volts is the least that a D. C. generator should be wound for, when intended for use on a moving picture machine, but mine is wound for 50 and is giving perfect satisfaction; of course, I am using no resistance for moving picture work, except that natural to the lamp."

We are very much obliged to you for the excellent description and photos of your plant. It will no doubt be of much value to our readers. The diagram came too late for comment. I cannot, however, understand how you can carry an arc, using only the arc resistance. Experience has taught that it is an impractical thing to do. If you are accomplishing, this, it is something unique and worthy of considerable study. Photos show front and back halves of operating room.

Wants to Write.—Oklahoma (name of town suppressed) writes: "If you have the time and the 'World' could spare the space, I would like to send in about ten pages for publication. I have been in the business six years and the sound of film passing through the machine is music for me. In fact, I am not contented except in the operating room, where everything must be in perfect order. If this doesn't miscarry, I will write you something for the Department in the near future."

We shall be pleased to have you send in any amount of matter you may desire. We cannot, of course, judge as to the amount of space which can be devoted to it until we have seen the Mss. Space in the paper is at a premium. I could fill the whole "Moving Picture World" with Department matter every week. The managing editor has been very liberal to us in the matter of space, but there are, of course, limits, and the five or six pages we have been using is about as much as we can reasonably expect to receive.

Fan Trouble.—Clear Lake, Ia., writes: "We received your Handbook some time ago and we also are in the class of satisfied purchasers. I find myself referring to the book a good many times and for the most part am successful in finding what I want within its pages. We are also readers of the 'Moving Picture World' and would not be without it. We have three D. C. fans hooked in on a street car line. The rheostat is one of our own make. There is over half a mile of coiled wire in it. The line voltage is 550; fans are hooked in series. The rheostat is in the basement. When we first throw on the switch the fans run all right; have good speed, but after about ten minutes there seems to be a drop in voltage and they seem to slow down and do no good. What is the cause of this?"

I cannot, of course, say with certainty, but in all probability the whole fault lies in the rheostat, provided the wires are large enough. When a rheostat is cold—that is to say, when the current is first turned on, it delivers a considerably higher amperage than after it becomes hot. In other words, as the wires get hot they offer higher resistance. Inasmuch as there is such a great length of wire in your rheostat, it probably operates to reduce the amperage very materially. You can test this out by making a temporary connection, cutting out a portion of the wire, so that when the fans begin to slow down, you can close the switch, thus reducing the resistance. You will see what I am driving at by referring to Fig. 16, page 37, of the Handbook. If the wires from rheostat are too small and get warm, larger ones should be installed at once.

Information Wanted.—Ohio (name of town suppressed) writes: "I am an operator and would like to know what the I. A. T. S. E. is and how an operator can become a member of it."

I. A. T. S. E. stands for the "International Association Theatrical Stage Employees," of which the operators are members where there is not enough for a separate union, and to which practically all unions of operators are affiliated where they are organized as a separate operators' union. You can become a member by making application to the nearest I. A. T. S. E. operators' union, or to the nearest I. A. T. S. E. local, which in your case would probably be Detroit, Cleveland, or possibly Cincinnati. Whether you would be accepted as a member without examination I could not say.

Experimenting.—Bakersfield, Ore., writes: "Am now experimenting on use of ¾-inch carbons for A C; also am trying to invent an arc lamp that will do away with lamp trouble. Will send you report and photos when I have done."

Will be glad to receive report of results of your work, Bakersfield. Trust you will succeed in evolving something of real value. Am a little skeptical about the large carbons, however.

Idea Preempted.—Lima, Ohio, sends in an idea for quick threading of film through fire-traps of magazines. Sorry, Lima, but the same identical thing has been in use for at least two years. The Motiograph, for one, has it. I am not certain, but believe it is patented. Anyhow, while the evolving of the scheme does you credit, it can, I am sorry to have to say, be of no commercial value to you for the above reason.

A New Camera.

Los Angeles is soon to be the headquarters for a company who will manufacture and place upon the market a new design of moving picture camera, improved printers, perforators, naming machines, coloring machines, and other important accessories allied with the moving picture producing industry. At the head of the new industry will be Mr. T. K. Peters, well known in the producing end of the moving picture business. In a chat with the writer, Mr. Peters gave a brief biographical sketch of his past work in the moving picture field, and told of the self-denial and uphill grind necessary for him to secure patents on camera improvements. Mr. Peters has been in the moving picture business for the past ten years. He entered the field as an operator. Shortly afterward joined a moving picture repertoire company and went abroad to England and France. Not long afterward the company got stranded in France. Mr. Peters then secured a position with the Paris headquarters of the Pathe company, with whom he worked for eighteen months in the capacity of camera man. His work with the company took him on journeys all over Europe and into the Far East in search of scenic material. After working eighteen months for the Pathe company, Mr. Peters returned to America, going to San Francisco, where he established a studio. The San Francisco fire caused him to lose everything, including a good Lumière camera. After the fire he came to Los Angeles and interested himself in legitimate theatrical management, managing a Spanish stock company in the Spanish Theater, and putting on Spanish dramas with an all-Spanish cast. The enterprise proved a failure, and he lost considerable money in the experiment. Mr. Peters then returned to San Francisco and bought into the nickelodeon business, which at the time promised big financial opportunities. A second fire wiped out this venture. He then returned to Los Angeles and secured a position with the New York Motion Picture Company as camera man at the local Bison studio.

Mr. T. K. Peters and His New Camera.

For the past five years he has devoted his spare time to experimenting with camera improvements that his past experience had suggested. As a result of five years' hard work he has perfected an improved non-infringing moving picture camera, which is soon to be placed upon the market. The camera is entirely new in construction, and contains many features that will appeal to the trade, one of the features being a multi-focal lens, another being that you can see the image as it would appear on the negative while the camera is in motion. Another commendatory feature of the new camera is its smallness, it being only 14 inches high and 8 inches wide, including the magazine which is enclosed in the camera boxing. In addition the camera contains the other essentials of a moving picture camera, including the level, sure focus, film punch, etc. The film meter shows the direct figures instead of on a dial. The diaphragm is controlled from the back of the camera, and can be absolutely controlled while the camera is in motion.

Mr. Peters has already sold three of the cameras, one of which is being used locally, and which the writer is informed from other sources is giving excellent satisfaction. In the near future a manufacturing plant will be erected in Los Angeles for the manufacture of the Peter's camera, printers, perforators, coloring machines, and other machinery for studio work, most of them being inventions of Mr. Peters, fully protected by international patents.

Later, it is the young inventor's intention to establish a local producing studio for the manufacture of American films, which will employ American actors, and produce American stories. Part of his plans also include the establishing of a moving picture studio in the Orient in which will be produced the Chinese and Japanese classics by Japanese and Chinese actors, to be marketed almost exclusively in the Orient. Mr. Peters speaks several Oriental languages fluently.

Associated with Mr. Peters, and having charge of the mechanical department, is M. Sasir, an experienced die cutter and thorough mechanic, who learned his trade in Vienna, and who is associated with Mr. Peters in the manufacture of the new apparatus.

The photograph shows the front view of the new camera, the inventor standing beside the tripod with his hand resting on the camera, and M. Sasir standing behind the lathe.

Reckless Reddy Reforms (Kalem).

Kalem is doing some wonderful work. There is no doubt about that. They are known in many places as the film without a studio. It is the firm belief of the directors of the Kalem Company that nature unadorned is the true handmaiden of the moving picture. In the matter of selecting artistic landscapes, the Kalem Company may be said to have arrived. It is quite certain therefore that anything they do, whether it be comedy or drama, is going to be a pretty thing to look at, for the reason that there is someone behind their camera who has an eagle eye for the eternal fitness of things.

Reckless Reddy Reforms is billed as a Western comedy, which is literally true. In brief, the story tells of how a wild but good-hearted cowboy was reformed from his bad habits of drinking and smoking and carousing by the seemingly mild interest and the hazel eyes of a Western prairie flower, who happened to be waiting table (temporarily) at the village restaurant at the opening of the story. The only chance that Reddy has to win this pretty waitress is to forswear everything that life seems to hold good to a bachelor. This was made all the harder for him to do by the connivance of his cowboy companions, who did their best to make him fall off the water-wagon, after having mounted to a very conspicuous seat. They, likewise, tantalized his nostrils with whiffs of the sweet cigarette to which he had said good-bye. The agony poor Red went through for the sake of winning such a sweet creature as Patricia Muggins was enough to make him deserving of anything. "Thus the brave deserve the fair," likewise, "Faint heart ne'er won fair lady." Thus it transpired that while his companions were having all manner of fun with him, Reckless Reddy was getting the inside track and none of them realized until they saw him leading her away from the Judge's office as a bride upon his arm that patience and perseverance conquereth all things.

One can readily see that the plot of the story is not exactly one that is going to oset the world on fire on account of any particular originality it possesses, but on account of the good acting and the pretty scenes all the way through, this picture is as clean and pleasing a little comedy as any one would wish to see. The interior restaurant scene is particularly well done. The settings are as near perfect as one could imagine. It really looks like a cheap restaurant. It has depth and is arranged just exactly as we would have arranged it ourselves had we been taking the picture. The exterior scenes are all redolent with glimpses of pretty landscapes, selected by an eye that knows beauty. All of these incidents combine to make Reckless Reddy's reformation the most delightful fifteen minutes we ever spent looking at a "Western picture."

COMMENTS ON THE FILMS

Licensed.

"Avenged" (Edison).—This is a story of Gaelic people, and it has some very beautiful scenes, including one that pictures the wedding. There are some incongruities in the film but whenever there is such an imaginative story going on the spectators are not to be less critical, though the story would have been much stronger without them. In one scene the acting actress of the tragic story does very well when she goes to her wounded husband.

"An Indian's Sacrifice" (Lubin).—The settings in this picture are splendid and the photography faultless. Its story is distinct. It seems to have several plots, pretty independent of each other. In the descriptive synopsis the statement was made that the Indian fell in love with the ranchman's daughter, because that he raised to get an eagle's feather and here himself in doing so. Now, nothing like this appears in the film. A circumstance which must prove embarassing to exhibitors who depend for their advertising of films on the stories sent out by the film maker. The action was sometimes caused along more by the sub-titles than by anything that happened in the film. The materials at hand were excellent, but much more could have been made out of them by greater care and judgment.

"And the Cat Came Back" (Essanay).—This is a slight amusing picture. It is amusing in a small way.

"She Got the Money" (Essanay).—This is a bright little comedy on the same reel with the above. There's a snooping hall bedroom, a proprietor who is nervous, and a fan that looks like a revolver. The woman was waiting for a check from her husband, but between the hall-boy and the proprietor she scared enough on the fan to continue her journey. It's amusing.

"Money in the Bank" (Kalem).—This is one of Kalem's lighter pieces. It pictures a collection of amusing characters, usually representative of types of boarding house people. The film has some more or less noticeable incongruities, but it is well acted and will be acceptable.

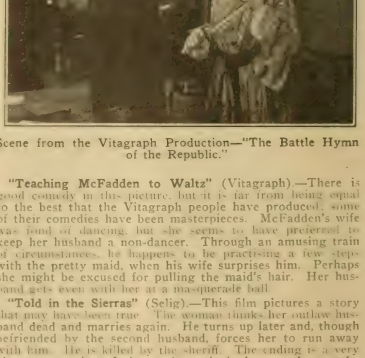
"For the Squaw" (Pathe).—Here is a subject that is old, yet the producer has treated it in a new way, or has introduced new subjects, and it seems quite like a new story. It tells of a man who left a sweetheart in the East to seek his fortune among the mines of the West. Tiring of loneliness he buys an Indian girl and lives with her as his wife. Later the old sweetheart writes this she is on her way West. The picture is made good to look upon by its excellent photography. The scenes are so pretty when the brooks are in flood and attractiveness to the pictorial portion.

"A Mexican Rose Garden" (Kalem).—Here is a love romance which contains heart-throbs and heart-breaks aplenty. Indeed it is one of the most emotional films the Kalem people have released in a long time. It tells the story of two Mexican lovers, each of whom believed love hopeless. So the man withdraws fro mthe world, and the woman lives a life of single blessedness. Long years after, they see their experience about to be repeated and take measures to prevent it. In this they are successful and the lovers whom they help are fortunate. The setting is picturesque and offers many scenes of rare beauty. The actors have performed their parts essentially, while the photographic work is equally well done.

"The Primal Call" (Biograph).—Once again the Biograph Company has found inspiration in Moody's "The Great Divide," and now feels that the result is not the heroine as in "The White Sister" or "The Wilds." The great fault is that the real primal man is not truthfully pictured. He exists, but he is neither soft nor tough. If this refined million-heir had been contrasted with a Walt Whitman, the picture would truly have gone somewhere, but this primal man sneers at the rich girl's party. The scenes showing the courtship of the ill-bred man of wealth surely make a sharp contrast with the better scenes and the master's courtship. With the exception of the two scenes the setting is the picture is commendable. There are some fine sea pictures in it.

"The Kiss of Mary Jane" (Melies).—This is a Western picture with most of the points that were apt to mark the early types of such. It has a horse-thief lover, a hanging interrupted in a most improbable manner, a chase of a bad man by cowboys, and a backwoods cabin with San Francisco furniture in it. Miss Story acts her part of it well, of course, and the others also act well; but it is not an important film.

"His Misjudgment" (Edison).—In many ways this is a beautiful picture. It affords an excellent chance for the Edison players to picture human emotions, and they utilize it with a good deal of power. The paralyzed husband's cure through fright when a curtain blown by the wind has knocked over the lamp, and his beautifully furnished room is in flames, is not made so convincing as his distress at what he thinks is his wife's selfish devotion to social pleasures. She had kept from him the fact that their fortune is gone, and is making a living singing in a theater. His vehement accusation when he is able to walk, but before he finds out the truth, hurt her sorely. The wife's representation of this scene is a very commendable piece of acting. It is worth seeing.



Scene from the Vitagraph Production—"The Battle Hymn of the Republic."

"Teaching McFadden to Waltz" (Vitagraph).—There is good comedy in this picture, but it is far from being equal to the best that the Vitagraph people have produced; some of their comedies have been masterpieces. McFadden's wife was fond of dancing, but she seems to have preferred to keep her husband a non-dancer. Through an amusing train of circumstances, he happens to be practising a few steps with the pretty maid, when his wife surprises him. Perhaps she might be excused for pulling the maid's hair. Her husband gets even with her at a masquerade ball.

"Told in the Sierras" (Selig).—This film pictures a story that may have been true. The woman thinks her outlaw husband dead and marries again. He turns up later and, though befriended by the second husband, forces her to run away with him. He is killed by the sheriff. The ending is a very pleasant surprise. It is acted convincingly enough to make it worthy and acceptable. Some of the scenes are extremely beautiful; but in one or two of the scenes, strange to say, the photography was too poor to bring out the faces.

"Higginses vs. Judsons" (Lubin).—This is a delightful comedy with a Kentucky feud for its setting. The old men, Jud and Higgins, empty their revolvers into a big cloud of smoke in a most bantam-like spirit, but young Judson had taken the bullets out of his dad's cartridges, and young Higginss had done the same for his dad's, so no harm was done. Each of the young men loved the other's sister. It is very well acted. Miss Lawrence is Sis Higgins, and Mr. Johnson is young Juddy. The photography is fine and the film wholly commendable.

"Tabarin's Wife" (Pathe).—Here is an adaptation of the opera "Il Pagliacci." It tells of a band of traveling actors, the wife of one of whom loves a young man. Her husband finds a note appointing a meeting, which opens his eyes to the real situation. In the opera, he and his wife appear in one scene where he kills her. This time it is really done. When the audience discovers that they have been witnesses of a real tragedy, they leave the room in horror, and the man is led away heartbroken. The piece is beautifully reproduced and the acting is unusually sympathetic. In fact, it is an excellent example of the art which Pathe puts into its films.

"Volendam, Holland" (Pathe.—Here is a good picture of an interesting Dutch village. The village itself, the people, their manners and costumes are adequately reproduced. It is an admirable addition to Pathe's long list of travelogs. They are all individual and they all possess some characteristic which makes them attractive.

"The Sleep Walker" (Vitagraph).—In this picture the love story seems to have been subordinated to one of its incidents. The early scenes serve to show the worthy character of the heroine and that the young doctor's mother is displeased with his attention to her. She seems to be a paid companion of the doctor's sister-in-law. A box of jewels is shown. The docor is to take them to a jeweler's for "repairs." This having them overhauled seems unconvincing. The girl walks in her sleep and removes the jewel-box to her desk and is discovered doing it by the doctor's mother. She is accused of theft. The doctor and the others the following night watch while she repeats the performance. She thus is proved innocent and the doctor presumably marries her. The picture is played by an all-star cast; but, in interest, doesn't come up to the best of the Vitagraph pictures.

"Lean Wolf's End" (Kalem).—The first object of this picture seems to show an Indian's vindictive treachery, and that seems hardly worth picturing. There's an army post love story in it, with a lieutenant as the successful rival of the chaplain for the love of the heroine. The chaplain and the heroine are kind to the Indians; the lieutenant is stern with them. The chaplain meddles and in the end the Indian, whom at some risk he has befriended, kills him for his pains. The Indians and white men totally misunderstand each other. In his death, while treacherously, Wolf's body is carried past, he marries the lieutenant and the heroine. There is a very pretty picture of Indian tepees with cooking-fires near them and an unusual silhouette of a camp fire at night with a war dance about it. In the last picture, Lean Wolf's body is being carried through, and the idea that is conveyed by thus showing it is not a high one. The play has other faults, but is uniformly well acted, though perhaps Lean Wolf's part is most convincingly carried.

"The Ransom" (Gaumont).—This picture would be wholly fine if it were only convincing, but it is so plainly a picture and not real life that its good acting is almost without effect. While the judge is wavering between his duty to the State and his love for his kidnapped daughter, Jimmie (the well-known little Gaumont player) brings him word that his daughter is safe and leads him to her. Jimmie's pose has excited the most favorable comment by his clever acting, and he was never better than in this picture. His part in it, and his part alone, makes it really worth while seeing. He makes the picture delightful.

"The Hidden Mine" (Essanay).—This Western picture shows how a gold mine was discovered under the cabin of an unsuccessful prospector. Two Indians visit the cabin three times and force his wife to give them food. The third time the little girl runs and tells her father. He returns and has them chastised with a whip. That might be is deceived from the cabin and the Indians set fire to it. The woman and her daughter with difficulty escape with their lives. When the miner returns he finds them shivering in their night clothes, beside the ruins of their shanty. He begins poking about among the ruins, seeking bits of metal which have not been destroyed by the fire, and turns up a nugget of gold.

"Old Indian Days" (Pathe).—Apart from the touch of sensationalism which all producers seem to think is necessary in depicting Indian life, this picture is satisfactory. It gives a good idea of the manners and customs of the Indians and shows in detail many of their peculiar ways. The love story running through it in no wise strengthens it, but perhaps adds a touch of heart interest which helps in holding the attention of the audience. Its main feature is its historical value, reproducing Indian scenes supposed to exist before the white man came.

"Two Overcoats" (Vitagraph).—This lively comedy shows two men in the wrong because of an accidental exchange of overcoats. The wife of the married man finds a letter in the pocket signed Norah, and his troubles begin. The bachelor's sweetheart finds a letter signed "your dear wife," and speaking of the children. Trouble sits on his door step. They happen to enter the same saloon to drown their troubles. There the matter is adjusted and the wife and sweetheart are afterward convinced that no duplicity exists.

"Barriers Burned Away" (Vitagraph).—Here is a film that tells in a dramatic way how a fire burned away the difficulty which had arisen between two brothers and their families. The burning building, with the little one's imprisoned inside, is impressive and there is a responsive thrill when the men come out of the smoke with the little forms in their arms, and the emotions are deeply touched when the brothers clasp hands and agree to forget the past.

"Transportation in Siam" (Pathe).—In these finely colored pictures the two chief carriers of Siam are shown—they are elephants and bullock-carts. The film is short and interesting. It ends with a race between three bullock-carts.

"Scenes in Our Navy" (Selig).—This well photographed picture shows the U. S. tars and marines drilling, marching and going through the setting-up exercises. Several of the great ships of war are shown at anchor.

"The Reporter" (Selig).—This farce is acted speedily and is therefore kept amusing. It might pass for a reporter's bad dream. The star man on the paper is sent by his editor to write up how it feels to be a burglar. The result is not very funny, but it isn't dull. The picture of the two owners of the house when they wake up and hear the crash when the reporter knocks the statuette from its stand is quite humorous.

"The Sublime Pardon" (Pathe).—This film pictures a character who could forgive the woman who eloped with her husband. The women are cousins, and the one who asks for forgiveness is on her deathbed. The outcome brings the husband and his former wife together again. The film is beautiful, not only because of very good acting and artistic settings, but the players are graceful and pleasing. It is photographed perfectly.

"A Sacrifice to Civilization" (Selig).—This is a pathetic story of an Indian lad, adopted by Americans and taken to a Northern city and put to school. The snow storms make him shiver; he gets consumption and dies. The story opens with a beautiful picture of the Indian's hut in a spacious mountain land. The tourists come and take the lad away. It ends with a very well acted scene where the old Indian father comes north and finds the son dying. His sorrow and despair and natural resentment at fate and the white man are finely shown.

"The Baseball Star from Bingville" (Essanay).—This film tells much of the organization of a big baseball club and is very interesting. A good deal of information is strung on the thread of a comic story. The practice on the field, the gymnasium work are shown, and a great game has been pictured with crowds streaming across the field at the end. It is a very welcome film.

"Her Sacrifice" (Biograph).—This love story has a dramatic ending. A poor girl loves a high-born Mexican. The young man's mother persuades the girl that a marriage would mean loss of honor. Accordingly, she leaves attachment for another sweetheart and the man believes her in danger. As soon as he departs she spurns the other one, who understands the girl's purpose and follows the stranger with murderous design. She follows and throws herself between them in time to receive the fatal shot. Her only remorseful is to die in the arms of the man she loved.

"Juarez After the Battle" (Kalem).—Here is a film of historic value. It is the first ever made of a modern city after it had withstood a siege and will go a long way toward disseminating information that cannot be questioned about the horrors of war. There are points of unusual interest, among which is the church of Guadalupe, 300 years old, back of which President Taft met President Diaz. The marks of the machine guns, the evidence of the discharge of dynamite and the wreckage are all graphically portrayed. It is a historic and educational film of extraordinary merit.

"How the Story Grew" (Lubin).—Here is a bright comedy telling how the story that two men had bagged a bear grew to be a serious matter, requiring the services of the sheriff. When the box was unearthed it was found that it contained a dead cat. Then they wanted to know who started the story. While the story is profoundly a comedy, those who have had experience in following up rumors of this or some other type know that it contains a great deal of truth.

"The Sleepy Tramps" (Lubin).—The adventures of two tramps are told on this film. They crept into a mattress to escape the rays of a farmer whose haystack they burned. Every sort of thing happened to that mattress, yet after it had been hurled by an express train over an embankment, the faces of the tramps appeared in the slits originally made. They had slumbered peacefully all the while. It is a good comedy, nevertheless.

"The Crusaders" (Edison).—Here is a film which embodies the romance which surrounds the Crusaders. With it is interwoven a tender love story, for each crusader in this film as he left England carried with him some token presented by her he loved. The film is picturesque and brings back the age of chivalry. We see the onset in the Holy Land, the wounding of the lover and his rival's interception of the message sent home. Eleanor waits, but the rival only returns with news of her lover's death. At last she consents to marry him, but on the wedding day the slave arrives bringing her knot of ribbon and the message that her lover lives. The Holy Land scenes were made in Cuba, some of the settings are probably reasonably accurate reproductions of scenes in England. The film is well made and the acting is spirited and satisfactory.

"Taming of the Shrew" (Eclipse).—This picture is very interesting. It is well acted and beautifully staged and also the story is made clear. It might be best charcterized as graceful and dignified. It will also safely be classed among the educational films. It is highly commendable.

"How Willie Raised Tobacco" (Edison).—The first scene in this comedy is a beautifully appointed room. The story tells of a sleepy-head son of rich parents who determines to raise tobacco and goes to Cuba. He has to put in a few days of hard work before he gets home again. A picture of a beautiful tobacco plantation is shown and a cigar factory in Cuba also is pictured. The comedy is interesting, but not important.

"Village Gossip" (Gaumont).—Here is a film which illustrates vicious human nature in a way to appeal strongly to thoughtful persons. A widow is befriended by a constable and becomes a servant in his house while his wife is ill. Shortly the gossips' tongues begin to wag and she is driven forth by the scandal, though perfectly innocent of wrong doing. The picture presents the truth too plainly to be altogether palatable.

"At Sunset Ranch" (Nestor).—There is heart interest in this Western story. In brief it tells of a cowboy who was ordered away because he dared to love the owner's daughter. Through a succession of exciting incidents, the tangles are ultimately unravelled and the young man is permitted to marry the girl he wanted. As has been mentioned before, a charm is given these Western pictures by the magical Nestor photography, which somehow makes the figures stand out with stereographic clearness and makes them appear to live upon the screen. It is a satisfactory Western picture, with plenty of life and stir in it and sufficient heart throbs.

"Just His Luck" (Nestor).—Here is a good comedy. It tells the story of two young men who seemed informed that the girl they both loved would marry the one that proved to be a real, live hero. The play is well acted and the photography is clear. It is a good comedy, and gave amusement to a critical audience.

"The Hermit's Gold" (American).—The most dramatic scene in this picture is where the young man, having received the gold from the hermit, gives a portion of it to the shallow girl whom he once loved, but whose vanity and desire for wealth the picture shows, has made one man a criminal and caused the death of another, after which he showers the rest upon the dead man's grave, in contempt. The story of the girl loved by two men ordering them to make a fortune for her and saying she would marry the one who succeeded first is interesting. The discovery of the hermit's hoard, the fight which ends in his being hurt so badly that he goes insane, and the actions of the girl when first one brother, then the other, seems successful in getting the gold she wants make good scenes. But at the climax the action of the brother when he spurns the gold and the girl alike is sufficiently dramatic and inspiring to win the admiration of any audience. This film is strong, well worked out and was favorably received where this reviewer saw it.

"Marked for Life" (Solax).—One may be forgiven for suspecting that the film producers work over old ideas again and again and put them into new dresses, as it were. The situation in which the blind wife of a sensitive musician, who is disfigured, is operated on and made to see is not new. However, there are new things in this picture, and this reviewer likes it as well if not better than any of the others like it that he has seen.

"The Foreman's Mine" (Bison).—The same background is used for this picture as for "The Lure of the Desert." The story is most improbable. There's one very exciting moment when the hero sits eating a bun over a blast that the villain has just touched off. He is blinded and an operation saves his sight.

"Foxy Grandma" (Thanhouser).—There's a good comic idea in this picture. Instead of Mamma flirting successfully with the interested suitor for the hand and, incidentally, the fortune of a pretty heroine, Grandmama does. We don't ask such a play to be convincing. The picture has one clear fault. If the country lover was to be shown as fortunate in the end, he shouldn't have been made such a lout. The Thanhouser Company is usually unfortunate in its country lads. This fault has spoiled some of its good pictures.

"The Unbearable Son" (Itala).—In this drama of Italian life in a busy sea-port town, the reckless son of a very honest father steals forty lire from a purse in his father's desk. The father had found the purse and had already written to its owner, whose name was stamped upon it. The son is present when the father discovers the loss. The distress of the old man and of his wife and the remorse of the son, who confesses, are pictured very well indeed. The players do much gesticulating, but they are Italians. The son hurries away and returns with the money. When the father finds by how great a sacrifice the son has obtained the money, he gladly forgives him. The film can safely be called strong, and is very commendable.

"Fortunes of War" (Imp).—The Imp players seldom fail when they picture human emotions. In trying to picture a battle scene without an army and without a general to give it orders, any company is likely to fail. The early scenes of this picture are remarkable. They're simply fine. The closing scenes, which also are what might be called home scenes, are as good; but the battle scenes are merely another failure. However, this reviewer was mighty glad to see that picture of Lincoln's cabinet. At the end, when Grant and Lee shake hands under the flag, one can readily see who is pictured.

"On the Brink" (Rex).—The very breath and spirit of the ocean is captured in this fine picture. Most of the scenes are so picturesque that one could look at them with pleasure by the hour. There is a fishing village on the Jersey coast called Galilee, a place loved by painters and visited in summer by "rusticators"—the term is not a compliment. There is no doubt that this village served as background for the story, and the story is good and well acted. It is, perhaps, the best moving picture of the sea, its beach and tumbling billows, that this reviewer has seen. The salty marshes, too, are beautifully pictured.

"Bill's Day Out" (Lux).—Here is a lively comedy with this favorite comedian performing various interesting stunts for the amusement of his many friends. It would be hard to imagine any difficulty which Bill did not encounter, ending with smoking a huge black cigar which was altogether too much for him. It is a pale, sick-looking Bill that returns home. But the audience has been treated to many a laugh before he goes the rounds.

"Weary Tom's Dream" (Lux).—Tom obtains work as a street-cleaner, but, becoming wearied, he lies down to sleep and dreams. He imagines he sees some lively winter sports, and, becoming interested in bob-sleighing, he enters into the sport himself. This farcical portion creates a good deal of hilarity among the audience. Ultimately he is brought to a realization of his position by two children turning the hose upon him as he sleeps.

"The Two Roads" (Yankee).—Here is a story which has a moral teaching. Two college chums eat together at the close of their term and agree to meet on the same day ten years later. One becomes a great detective and is given the task of discovering the man or woman who stole a famous diamond. For years he seeks the jewel, but is baffled at every turn. Just as he goes to the meeting place agreed upon, a note is handed him saying that the owner of the diamond has given up hope of ever recovering it, and tells him to stop searching. He tells his friend the story. When it is finished the friend slowly draws a jewel-case from his pocket and discloses therein the stone. Then the detective realizes for the first time who the thief is and why it has been so difficult to follow him. The closing scene is dramatic and arouses the emotions of the audience to an unusual degree.

"O, Say, Jim" (Powers).—This is a dramatic comedy which is quite sure to be popular. A very humorous closing scene is worked up to with much skill. Its quality is indescribable. The whole of it is amusing, but the end is very funny.

"Foolshead is Jealous" (Itala).—Foolhead very often causes china and crockery to be broken, as in this film, but in nearly every appearance of this clever actor there are, as in this, new and surprising things also. He is still amusing.

"What the Tide Told" (Reliance).—This is a dramatic story of fisher folk. The background is the Jersey coast, and a fishing village. One scene shows a rowboat riding the beach-combers as it makes its way out, and shows this exciting adventure better than does any of the other beach pictures that we have had recently. All the sea pictures in this film are commendable. The situation is convincing enough to be interesting. If it falls short of being a true picture of life in places, we nearly always feel this reason. We are satisfied, for instance, to have the warden weigh the evidence after the villain's death, and free the hero who was accused of poisoning his aunt for her money. The lovers sit on the beach with the ocean waves and moonlight for a closing scene. The acting is good.

"The Actress and the Cowboys" (American).—Here is a Western picture telling the story of the experiences of an actor and his wife stranded among the cowboys. Unsuccessful in disposing of his wife's stage jewelry he goes to work at feeding pigs. She obtains a situation as a waitress in the cowboys' eating house. She makes such a hit with them that they purchase all the man's jewelry and present it to her. He has the money, she has the jewelry, and though there is some suspicion on the part of the husband that she has been indiscreet, the difficulties are patched up and they depart, presumably for Broadway, while a disconsolate bunch of cowboys watch their exit.

"The Sky Pilot's Intemperance" (American).—This lively Western comedy presents the seeming fall from grace of a minister who undertakes to preach temperance to the cowboys. They obtain a jug of whiskey and a funnel and proceed to give him a sample of the stuff he is railing against. He goes home to his wife intoxicated, and the last view the audience has of the unfortunate parson is while he is getting a vigorous application of the water cure from the pump operated by his irate wife.

"War and the Widow" (Champion).—An entertaining story is told on this film of a Southern widow, loved by a Confederate and by a Federal. Her home is between the lines. Both lovers visit her. One day the Confederate is present when the Federal arrives and hides under the table. The Union officer eats his dinner and then proceeds to capture his Confederate rival in an amusing way. The widow doesn't care for that and informs the Confederate soldiers of the fact. Soon the Union major is in the same predicament. She doesn't like that either. So she helps in a somewhat sensational escape. Then follows a dashing chase by Confederates, succeeded by an equally brilliant attack and rescue by the Union cavalry. No favorites are shown in this. One is as good as the other. And the widow capitulates to the Union officer. It is a war story with war's horrors discreetly eliminated.

"The Little Leader" (Imp).—Here is a strongly emotional film, with the death of a great musician at the moment of success. Then follows the spectacle of a boy, little more than a child, seizing his father's baton and directing a complicated opera while his father lies dead just back of the curtain. The details are worked out with care, and the emotions are deeply stirred. The boy's work is so good that the manager and himself are warmly congratulated, after which the manager adopts him and the picture closes with the manager putting the boy to bed while a vision of the father smiles down from above. It is a simple story, yet there is something about it which appeals strongly to the emotions and tears rise unbidden as the picture proceeds.

"Courting Across the Court" (Thanhouser).—The recent "Votes for Women Parade" has an important place in this film. A parade is usually a heart-stirring affair, and one with a purpose or for a cause is especially so. This parade, shown in the midst of a love story, makes the film effective. The lawyer mother of the comedy's petted heroine makes her read dry law-books until she is sick of them. The hero takes the office just across the court. When the mother and her friends bring the "Votes for Women" banners back to her office after the parade, they see the marriage ceremony being performed in the office across the court.

"An Indian's Love" (Bison).—This is a very interesting film. It has all the qualities that make a picture successful. It tells an exciting heart-story truthfully. It is instructive, as showing Indian customs, and it is free from offensive incidents. It is well acted and some of its scenes are very beautiful. There are no white men in it.

"Summer Madness" (Powers).—This film is certainly not dull. The decidedly tangled love story is made clear and understandable to the spectators, and those who watched, appeared to get a good deal of fun out of it. The summer-mad maiden who sees her beau kissing his sister whom she doesn't know is determined to commit suicide. She has her choice between hanging, which chokes her too much, the sharp knife, which cuts, and drowning. She finds the water too cold and then her lover comes. When he gets near enough to catch her she tries to make the plunge. When he is holding her safe she decides to let over a precipice, when at the sound of the Angelus bell she thinks better of it and decides to live. Happily, at the same moment her sweetheart comes along and joins her on bended knees in reciting the ancient prayer. The acting throughout was fair and the photography quite good. Such pictures leave a pleasant recollection in the mind of the spectator and are much to be preferred to the cheap and hackneyed melodrama.

"The Ghost of the Vaults" (Great Northern).—Here is a film showing a mixed-up love affair. A girl loves one man; her father desires her to marry another. To make her submission more certain, he imprisons the man she wants. The father has a hoard of gold which he keeps in a coffin in a vault, a combination so grewsome that it makes the audience feel creepy. The man whom he wants the girl to marry discovers the hiding place and while he is in the coffin examining his find of gold, the girl, walking in her sleep, touches the rod which holds up the lid of the coffin and it falls, holding him a prisoner inside. The lover appears on the scene at this juncture. The girl, awakened by the moose fauns, and falls into the arms of her lover. The whole film is ghastly, but perhaps will be more popular for that.

"The Cowboy's Ruse" (American).—In this film the cowboy organizes a kidnapping scheme to secure the daughter of the Eastern man who objects to his attentions. The plan succeeds and, when the cowboy returns the girl safe, the father looks upon him as a hero and withdraws his objection. The charming widow, with whom the father is in love, partially compensates for the loss of his daughter. There is scenic art and action in the picture, and perhaps the old story is as well told as it could be. Cowboys are quite given to backsliding, at least in pictures, and to represent them at their outside pastime is to maintain traditions.

"Love is Best" (Pilgrim).—The story deals with the human emotions while the Imp people are most apt in picturing. It opens with a country girl with a beautiful voice accepting a chance to sing for her living in New York and in the midst of the triumphs hears her voice. Then follows the home coming to living hearts that had been waiting for her, but the company leader succeeded in making the dramatic tell. The girl's father is too young in the first place, and no one else with an important part in the picture save him acts very effectively. The scenes are faultlessly photographed.

"His Romance" (Yankee).—Very interesting scenery well photographed is about all that this reviewer can find to commend in this picture. It is the weakest that the Yankee people have turned out in some time. The producer seemed to realize this, for he permitted in it a bit of farcical play (Andy and John on the golf links) that confused the story and made it still worse. The jealous, rich cousin's running after the heroine and the hero seems unconvincing, and the rest of the romance is even less so. In truth, such a play is impossible to act, and the better the players are who attempt it, the worse the result.

"Death of Don Juan" (Eclair).—These operatic pictures are very acceptable not only because one can imagine the music that accompanies the well-known scenes, but it is interesting to see such of them as can be taken freely out of doors on a real lake, for instance. The stories are, for the most part, dramatic and well constructed, and the motion picture companies act them very well. In this case the players are graceful and in their picturesque costumes make beautiful pictures. The film is very commendable.

"The Boy Scouts" (Champion).—This real must be like a dream out of a better world to our small boys, and it is quite interesting even to the sophisticated. The boys wade through rivers, go through all kinds of games and sports, swim, come near being drowned, are then rescued and—joy of joys—fight with a lot of Indians, evidently members of the famous Hoboken tribe. You may be very sure that the Indians were "beaten to a frazzle" by the boy scouts, though it looked kind of black for two of the young scouts, who fell into an ambush and one came perilously near being broiled over a slow Indian fire. It was a splendid thing, the main body of the scouts came up just in time and there was a battle, in which some of the boys and Indians were wounded. This gave the boys a chance to show their skill in giving first aid to the wounded. It was highly creditable to the boys that they took care of the Indian wounded as well as their own. It all ended very happily, the commander of the boys' camp and the Indian chief smoking the pipe of peace, "just as the sun went down." Such pictures instead of making boys anxious to run away from home to deplete the stock of American aborigines have on the contrary a tendency to make them stay right here, where they may be sure of seeing good Indian pictures.

"Sixtus the Fifth" (Ambrosio).—There have been some bad Popes beyond all doubt, and where their history is the contemporaneous history of their times their acts are legitimate subjects for representation in moving pictures. If, however, the wickedness of a particular Pope is to be shown on a moving picture screen, let there be some historical foundation, otherwise the thing becomes a slander on dead men, who depend on professors of history to defend them. Pope Sixtus V was no doubt a tyrant, perhaps he was cruel and even brutal, but his worst enemy has never accused him of having been licentious. The plot I fear has been constructed not out of history, but out of the needs of the film maker. As it treats of a subject which may easily offend religious feelings, such a departure from historical accuracy is to be deplored. In some respects, too, the picture is ridiculous without meaning to be so. Popes do not have their tiaras on the little table in their sleeping chamber, our Italian friends ought to know that much at least. There are many clever situations in the film, much good acting and the injection of controversial matter into the film detracts from its merits from the exhibitor's point of view.

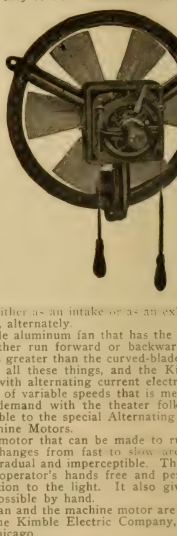
"Trials of an Immigrant" (Rex).—This is a picture of the piteous trials of an Italian woman, wife of a drunken immigrant. The scenes are in some seaport town near New York. The only criticism we can fairly make is on the score of the photography, in the print we saw projected one or two of the scenes were very bad. The acting was very commendable. Mr. Johnson played the drunken husband. The young lady who played his wife did some fine work, particularly when, after her attempted suicide, she and her protector and his mother sit on the porch. This scene has much to commend it. The ending of the story is satisfying.

Advantages of Alternating Current.

Those of our readers who are fortunate enough to be on alternating current circuits for light and power, have advantages that are not enjoyed by theaters on direct current circuits.

In the first place, alternating current is the natural current, and it is only forced into direct current by artificial means that destroy a very considerable percentage of the original efficiency in converting the natural alternations or pulsations into a direct flow of the current. In the next place, a short, broad-shouldered man in Chicago (his name is Austin Kimble) has created an alternating current motor for fans and for moving picture machines which does a number of things that direct current can't do at all. Take the fan motor, for instance. It goes forward or backward at will; runs at any speed (forward or back) from 80 revolutions per minute up to from 550 to 800, according to size. It can be used to pull fresh air in or to push bad air out, fast or slow, and the cost of operation varies with the speed.

You know how it is with other fans: They either go full tilt or not at all. Full tilt, they cost full maximum meter-bill, whether you need full fan-power or not. But with the Kimble fan it is different, for you save money every time you reduce speed, and you can reduce speed by the pull of a chain, whenever you want to; and make the fan either pull in or push out the air, just as you think best, by the same simple chain-pull.



For instance, after the last night-performance, you can set the Kimble fan at low speed (and low cost) and let it run all night, exhausting the air of the theater, so that by morning the air is crisp and fresh. Then, when the first crowd begins to assemble, you can speed it up as much (or as little) as conditions demand, running it either as an intake or as an exhaust fan, or one after the other, alternately.

They use a straight-blade aluminum fan that has the same air-moving efficiency whether run forward or backward; in either case the efficiency is greater than the curved-blade fan. No other fan motor does all these things, and the Kimble motor can do them only with alternating current electricity.

This same novel feature of variable speeds that is meeting with such extraordinary demand with the theater folk has been adapted by Mr. Kimble to the special Alternating Current Moving Picture Machine Motors.

It is a small, noiseless motor that can be made to run at any speed desired. Its changes from fast to slow are not made by "steps" but are gradual and imperceptible. The use of this motor leaves the operator's hands free and permits him to give all his attention to the light. It also gives a steadier motion than is possible by hand.

Both the motor-driven fan and the machine motor are built in a variety of sizes by the Kimble Electric Company, 1118 Washington Boulevard, Chicago.

Governor John K. Tener of Pennsylvania has organized a National Board of Censorship consisting of two persons, which will pass on all of the films exhibited in the nickelodeons and those of the films manufacturers in Pennsylvania. A fee of $2.50 will be charged for each examination.

The Declaration Of Independence.

The Thanhouser Company's patriotic film for the Fourth of July pictures, in a way that stirs, the heroic acts of our forefathers. It is called "The Declaration of Independence," and its scenes are laid in Boston, on the road to Lexington, and in Philadelphia. The love story of John Hancock, the man who could sign his name for kings to read, and Dolly Quincy, one of the belles of Boston, furnishes the thread on which the thrilling incidents that the film pictures are strung.

The picture opens with a garden party, at which we meet Samuel Adams, the rich John Hancock and Dolly Quincy. Hancock was such a dandified man that everyone thought him a royalist; but after he meets Dolly he becomes a patriot so staunch that at the famous "Boston Tea Party," which is shown, Hancock directs the emptying of the cases of taxed tea, and does it without disguise.

The authorities decide to arrest him for high treason, and we are permitted to read the warrant. He is warned, and the minute-men conduct him in his coach to Lexington. We see them as they reach the house where he is to stay, and they cheer for liberty again and again. But Hancock is not safe even in Lexington, for General Gage is about to take his redcoats there and intends, after destroying some military stores, to capture him. Shortly we see that Gage is reckoning without his host, without the ever-ready minute-men, and without Paul Revere.

General Gage's troops begin the march, but, look! high up in the tower of the Old South Church there comes a light. That is Paul Revere's signal. He waits beside his white horse. One light means that they will come by sea, and he must be sure of their route before he starts, so he still watches. Another light appears, and two lights gleam side by side from the tower. It is by land that they come, and he is off.

Now follows the wild night ride down toward Lexington. There's a cry of alarm, a knock at a door, and the minute-man and his sons, musket in hand, are out and ready. Calmly the redcoats march. Don't they see the people are hurrying out of sight this way and that? Are they contemptuous of these farmers? Let them be contemptuous. Wait! There is a cloud of white smoke above the fences. That is from the shots heard round the world. The red-coated regulars tremble; their line breaks; now they are in retreat.

The pictures now show us Philadelphia and the hall where the Continental Congress is meeting. The Declaration of Independence is brought in and read. One after another, these brave men, putting their fortunes in jeopardy, putting their necks in a noose, rise and sign the paper. It is a scene to fill the heart with fervor; it is a scene to thrill us and to make us proud. And to look upon pictures of such scenes is a new and better way to spend our glorious holiday than even to fire cannon.

There will be many admirers of the Thanhouser pictures who will look twice to recognize their favorite players as found 'neath powdered wig in "The Declaration of Independence." It was imperative in order that an accurate reel be turned out that the players bear a resemblance to the original participants in the stirring events of '76, and to look the part, each player had to assume a "make-up" that almost amounted to a disguise. But by the aid of the list below, identification of favorites becomes simple.

JOHN HANCOCK	George Lessy
DOLLY QUINCY	Julia Taylor
PAUL REVERE	Frank Crane

Champion Will Film Dubuque's Water Carnival.

Dubuque, Iowa, is in throes of excitement over the big motor boat regatta of the Mississippi Valley Power Boat Association which takes place during the week of July 4th. It is expected that there will be 1,500 boats taking part in the races, parades etc. It is also whispered that some motor-boat records will be broken—providing the new hydroplane boats are entered.

Being centrally located in one of the most populous valleys of the country it is believed that there will be at least 50,000 visitors. The Champion Film Company are sending a director and camera man to Dubuque to take moving pictures of the races, parades, carnival and the general views of the town in its holiday attire. They have been given the exclusive rights by the Association to take this big event, which, as a topical subject is bound to be of interest to the exhibitor and his patrons.

TRADE MARK

THE World Owes You a Real Living and the easiest way to collect it is to jump into the moving picture game—right now—while it's the popular craze. But get in right. Make that crowd that just "pays a visit" become your steady patronage.

The Edison Projecting Kinetoscope is the machine that will always do it. It's the pictures it projects—clear, brilliant, steady, non-flickering pictures—that make your show a pleasure, not an eyestrain. It's the machine with all parts instantly accessible, interchangeable and built to stand the steady grind.

TRADE MARK

SECURING EVIDENCE (Rex).

Clean comedy-film is a good sample. A few years ago such a comedy would have been considered a classic, to-day it is just good and useful comedy. It is a reel which will go anywhere be welcome, because it may stand for the comic part of the program with great advantage. The plot is all right, as average comedy plots go, and once it is under way the laughs are hearty and numerous. The fun on Coney Island is fast and furious, but never in the slightest degree rough or offensive. All the scenes on the merry isle have been arranged with decided cleverness and are sure to please. While we are on the subject we say in passing that comedy being a necessary staple, not a luxury like feature films, the maker of comic films may be sure of tolerant criticism. We simply must have fun and relaxation, and a reel like this gives it to us in the proper shape. The climax was, as a comedy climax always ought to be, short, but very, very laughable. When the wretched amateur photographer, who in an evil hour had volunteered "to secure evidence" retires his hand with great difficulty—he had just been discharged from the hospital and cut a sorry figure—the audience feels that it has had a good laugh, which alone was worth the price of admission." The more we have of such harmless and humorous skits the better for everybody in the business.

The latest movement of the Russell Sage Foundation in Syracuse is to secure a sane Fourth of July by the aid of moving pictures. A reel of film entitled "A Sane Fourth of July" has been got up by this organization, written by Clarence Arthur Perry, a writer of educational subjects.

"MUSTANG" PETE'S LOVE AFFAIR (Essanay).

When the Essanay Company issued that master comedy "Alkali Ike's Auto," an exhibitor in Butte, Mont., penned the following letter to the producers of the picture, enclosing a bill for eighty cents:

"Gentlemen," it read, "we are enclosing a bill for eighty cents against the Essanay Company. We have just shown your Alkali Ike's Auto and the audience laughed so much that they shook the bolts and nuts off the seats. We have fixed up the seats, but think you should pay for the bolts."

This letter, which is exceptionally witty, was certainly a compliment for Mr. Anderson's comedy, or comic, and proof that people still like comic pictures. There were many letters of praise from exhibitors all over the country, who pronounced the film an unusually good money-maker and who asked for more of the same kind. This attitude of the people for the broad comics or low comedy, as it is sometimes termed, is certainly an argument against the cry of "the people want nothing but 'high-brow' comedies now." That the comedy chase is just as funny as it was two years ago, providing it has those qualities of freshness and novelty in the situations and ingenuity in the management, is evident in the numerous recent efforts of several film manufacturers and the popularity that the films have won in the theaters.

In Mustang Pete's Love Affair the plot is extremely broad and develops situation after situation of extremely mirth-provoking qualities. While the story claims but little originality in plot the business of each situation is novel, the producer having displayed versality and ingenuity in the situations which are equally as good as in "Alkali Ike's Auto." The two characters, "Mustang" Pete and "Alkali" Ike, who played together as the rivals in "Alkali Ike's Auto," appear in this later comedy, only the situation is reversed. Mr. William Todd, as "Mustang" Pete, and Mr. Augustus Carney, as "Alkali," are just as droll and laughable as in the other "Snakeville" story.

A NEW FILM COMPANY IN CHICAGO.

The World's Best Film Company is the name of a new concern incorporated for $25,000 and located at 809 and 810 Boyce Building, Chicago, Ill. This company is going to make a specialty of feature films. Popular, genial Tom Quill is back in our midst and is going to be the general manager. "Feature films and nothing else" is our motto, said Mr. Quill, and we are for the present time in negotiations for really unusual feature productions from every part of the world. I am not quite prepared for publicity, but expect to make an announcement in a week or so in the columns of the "Moving Picture World."

A SATISFACTORY PICTURE

In producing "Enoch Arden," the Biograph Company has fallen in line with the suggestion of this page. In doing so they have done justice to themselves, more than pleased the public, given an impetus to the proper class of films required, and proved again that there are more subjects already written waiting for reproduction without waiting for the slowly revolving brain of the melodrama scenario-writers; educational cinematography has been helped.

ESSANAY AUTO RACE PICTURES REALISTIC.

Motion pictures of the 500-mile International Sweepstake races held at the Indianapolis Speedway on Memorial Day attracted hundreds of people to the Theater Voyons in Central Street yesterday and today, and undoubtedly many more will witness the pictures tomorrow, which will be the last day. The pictures are the most realistic ever seen in Lowell, and one watching the pictures imagines that he is on the grounds of the greatest automobile track in the country. Every important event in the race from start to finish is shown. As the cars speed around the two and one-half mile circular track the numbers are plainly seen, some of the cars can be immediately recognized by automobile enthusiasts, as can the drivers of some of the machines. A feature of the film is the heroic act of Harry Knight, who, driving a Westcott car, in order not to run over Jagersberger's mechanician, who had fallen from the car, overturns his own car and wrecks two others. There is not one detail in connection with the accident that is missing from the picture. The "throwing" of tires as the machines whiz around the track adds to the spectacular side of the exhibition.—Lowell (Mass.), Courier-Citizen.

SELIG COMPANY NOTES.

While taking one of the riding scenes in Selig's "The White Medicine Man," recently, an accident occurred which very near proved fatal. One of Mr. Bogg's expert riders, Frank Camby, while leading a posse of mounted Indians around one of the sharp turns in the road, was thrown from his horse with such force that he was unconscious for several hours. By almost a miracle he escaped being trodden under foot by the other riders who followed him around the bend at a terrific rate of speed. During the mixup, one of the cameras was put out of commission, but luckily the negative remained uninjured.

CORONATION SUCCESSFULLY FILMED.

As if to refute a report that has been circulated in the daily press that the privilege to photograph the coronation ceremonies had been denied, we are in receipt of a cablegram from Charles Urban, of Kinemacolor fame, stating that the whole ceremony has been successfully recorded, including the display of crown jewels.

IBSEN'S "DOLL'S HOUSE" FILMED.

The scene of Ibsen in the study, and within on the screen a strong film from a story by him, proved a good draw for picture houses throughout the country a couple of months ago when "Pillars of Society" was released. This was the first story of the great Dane ever made into a film. The success of the picture decided Thanhouser to do another from the writings of the author, and "The Doll's House" was selected. The reception of this reel will be closely followed by the folks at New Rochelle and it is at all hearty a strong series of Ibsen films will result. The picture comes out Friday, July 28th, as the first feature reel to follow this week's "The Declaration of Independence."

The Kinemacolor Company of America have been experimenting for the benefit of the exhibitors, on different makes of moving picture machines. The Kinemacolor Company want to make it plain that all American machines when properly fitted up by their experts can be made to show "Kinemacolor." The Morningside, Powers and the American Standard have already been fitted with Kinemacolor attachments.

PURE AIR IN THEATERS.

The Pure Air Appliance Company, of Chicago, is placing on the market a device which is new and wonderful in its simplicity and effect, and is used in purifying and deodorizing the atmosphere in theaters, by the use of the electric fan. The managers of the theaters in Chicago and elsewhere where these appliances have been installed cannot speak too highly of the benefits derived and in many instances high cost devices for purifying the atmosphere have been displaced by the fan appliance. The general welfare and health of the public is becoming a vital issue with people of to-day, and consequently the people at large have become educated to a point where they will not permit themselves to become contaminated by any unsanitary conditions that may prevail in theaters or elsewhere. Wide-awake managers are taking advantage of these facts and placing two to four of these devices on the fans and in so doing they find that it is not necessary to close any theater, for the atmosphere is absolutely free from germs and is deodorized by the essence of a pine or eucalyptus odor, for which the public spend millions of dollars yearly in traveling to Maine or California to breathe and are benefited thereby.

CORRESPONDENCE

Los Angeles.

Summer Theater.—24th and Central Avenue has changed the section from Licensed to Independent, and is now booking three reels of Independent film from Meines Brothers local exchange.

New Airdome Opens.—A new airdome, located on North Broadway, opened last week. It is using Independent service.

New Whittier Theater.—A new moving picture theater is rapidly nearing completion in Whittier, near Los Angeles. The new theater will open June 23rd, with new independent films booked through the local office of Miles Brothers.

New San Jacinto Theater.—A moving picture theater is about to open in San Jacinto, Cal. The new theater will book into our Independent service. Harry E. Overright, the proprietor, has just signed a contract with the local Miles Brothers Exchange for his film bookings.

Films for Church.—E. H. Rentzepolder the pastor of the Salem congregational church, will soon be able to show films to his congregation. The City Council next week will pass upon the draft of the city attorney's recently completed moving picture ordinance which is expected to be adopted by the council the coming week. The new ordinance will contain the provision that moving pictures may be exhibited in churches where the seating space is equal to 6 per cent of the total floor area. For many weeks the hands of the pastor have been itching for the privilege of showing moving pictures in his church.

$1,000 Show Circuit for the North.—Word comes from San Francisco of the recent formation of a $1,000,000 moving picture and vaudeville theater circuit, now in process of formation by a group of Northern capitalists. The corporation engineering the scheme, is known as the Pantages Management Co. The plans of the company include establishing a chain of theaters in eight Northern California cities with the headquarters of the company at San Francisco. Ralph Pincus, well known in Northern moving picture circles, is the general manager of the new corporation. The theaters already secured and now ones about to open, are: The Pincus, San Francisco; Victory Theater, San Jose; Yosemite Theater, Stockton; Majestic Theater, Chico. Other cities in the combination in which houses have already been secured or will be built in the near future, are: Sacramento, Bakersfield, Fresno and Gonzlinga. The theaters will use an equal number of moving pictures and vaudeville acts.

Many are the persons who have adopted moving picture shows as a means of relaxation, until they have acquired the habit. We have sometimes wondered if the motion picture show is not in itself a discipline as it is a pleasure. There is a possibility that many who visit these places with regularity do so out of a failure to exercise their own imaginations to the delightful degree possible, or to stimulate their own dreams. It is likely that if the world is something of a great theater, in which your actors must live on the collected glory of the greater ones and where you who do not get at all watch with hungry eyes the noble playing of the world's workers. Those who sit still must lose their sluggishness in the shadow of the heights.—Los Angeles "Daily Times."

The Most Local Churches to Show Films.—The First Congregational and the First Presbyterian churches of Los Angeles announce that in the near future moving pictures will be used in their evening performances. During the summer months the two churches will consolidate and hold meetings in a local auditorium. The two church choirs, of long members, will be a feature of those evening open air services. The evening services of the season are to be accompanied by motion pictures of biblical settings and religious interest. The other city churches will watch the experiment with interest, and if it is a success will probably follow the example of their more progressive brethren and install projectoscopes in their own auditorium. Some exhibitors with wards the street has talked approval of the plan, the moving picture men say it will eventually lead to increase the business of the average exhibitor. Moving picture theaters in Los Angeles, as well as elsewhere, have been denounced from the pulpit many times, all of which has not been lost upon the average church-going mayor of moving picture conduct. Such has been their misinformed pastor teachings and who believe that the pictures contain a harmful effect upon school children. Now that their own pastors are about to show films they should not see that error, and accept the more unprejudiced patronage to the picture theater that they do to the legitimate theaters.

Arthur S. Hyman, President of the Hyman chain of theaters, has returned from a three-days business visit to San Francisco.

Four Arizona Theaters Go Independent.—I. Olsen, manager for the Phoenix, Ariz., branch of the California Film Exchange, announces that he has secured four Arizona Licensed houses over into the Independent caravan. The following Arizona theaters have signed up with the Phoenix branch for service: Empire Theater, Clifton; Elk Theater, Morenci; Liberty Theater, Bisbee; Elk Theater, Prescott.

D. B. Marcowitz, manager of the local branch of the California Film Exchange, has gone to San Francisco on a three days' business trip. He is expected back early in the week. R. V. SPENCER.

St. Louis.

The O. T. Crawford Vaudeville Circuit has established since the airdome season opened twelve new exhibitors and announces that twelve more are to be said to use 2,000. Very the construction of Grete and Darling Marcus and are possessed together the largest flaming airdome circuit in the company, besides operating the most in number of domes, continues to run on regular lines of business, and has fixed plans for numerous new constructions for the erection of others, which will be opened in the fall.

A new theater with a seating capacity of 2,000 opened under the proprietorship of the O. T. Crawford Co., known as the Lyric, on Grand Ave. The house has been constructed on the most fine in title and ceiling can be removed and an airdome made out of it. Lady ushers will be in charge of the seats. They have closed their airdome at Pendleton, and Fashion Avenue.

The management of the Lafayette Photoplay House, situated at Jefferson and Lafayette Avenues, have secured the exclusive use of summer and have opened directly across the street a very commodious airdome.

The Kinsey Theaters have closed here for the season. The Villiage Crovals Theater, located at Grand and Lafayette Avenues, and the handsomely situated one around the corner.

The Pressers Park, a summer resort is entertaining the public with a four moving picture shows.

The Allandan Theater, formerly owned by Russell and Irons, of this city, has been leased by I. W. Zendall, of the Zendall Amusement Co. will be turned into a moving picture theater. The policy of the house is not known as yet, but it will have a 5c admission. The opening date has not been stalled. The date for opening has not been set. Further particulars will be given later.

Mr. Al Wilcox, of the Seattle Stage-Lighting Co., has been let the contract for installing the operating booth at the Garrick Theater.

The National Theater, on Pike Street, on every Friday afternoon, present the women patrons with a silver plated teaspoon. The idea is to have them become regular patrons and receive a set.

Mr. Ray Grombacher, of the Pacific Film Exchange, of this city, has left for Vancouver, B. C., Canada to open a branch office. Mr. Guy Embree states that the opening will be held on June 15th per week. This makes three Independent exchanges for Vancouver the Pacific Film Exchange, the Canadian Film and the Vancouver Film Exchange.

Mr. W. D. Spurrier, of the Savoy Theater, leaves the Pacific Film Exchange next week and will take service from the Western Film Co.

Mr. Red Widemann, Manager of the Acme Theater goes to the Licensed ranks Monday next. The policy of the house will be three reels to the show for the three changes per week.

The Busy Theater, on 3rd Avenue will change their service from the Pacific Film Exchange to the Western Film Co. The policy of the house will remain the same.

New England

Scenic Park Casino, Revere, Mass., a summer spot for amusement seekers, was opened for the season Thursday, June 20, with a vaudeville and picture bill. The park is one of the most popular resorts of the kind in the vicinity of Boston. The Casino, which is a large building, has been remodeled and redecorated for the season. Vaudeville and pictures run throughout the season of ten weeks.

The Providence Moving Picture Company has applied to the Board of Police Commissioners of Providence for a license to operate an automobile Sunday. Theaters are closed on Sunday and the theaters in this country generally are closed on that day, although almost all Sunday entertainment of this character was successful in obtaining the signatures of residents enough to intended to secure a license. The board of police commissioners would not be in position to favorably consider the granting of licenses. Messrs. Fay & Bullette and W. S. Rockwell, the promoters of this scheme, say that they have been making every effort to obtain the needed signatures, and are also prepared for the statement that the nearby residents are signing the petition without any hesitation. High-class outdoor pictures and "pop" vaudeville will be the attractions, should the theater be allowed to open. It said about Providence it would appear more difficult to obtain a license at this end, as several applications have already been dismissed this season.

Pines Park, Haverhill, Mass., opened its summer season Sunday, June 23. Four reels of Lawrence movies and some new bathing girls are summer resort and it is confidently expected that a prosperous season is before the park. This house is leased from the owner (which was specified).

The Scenic Theater, Hartford, Conn., is doomed, as the entire building is to be speedily torn down, thus to make room for a new office building. The Scenic Theater itself is practically a new building, and the theater was held as doing a fair business.

Manager John Keon, of the Theater Comique, Salem, Mass., evidently thought that Sunday, the Fourth of July is some time away, it might be well for the parents of children to give some attention at this early date to the safety of the little ones on that date. Accordingly, Manager Keon secured the Edison, "A Safe Fourth of July," and featured the reel heavily for three days. Mr. Keon also is a true exponent of uplift for moving pictures, and visited the mayor of the city government to his cosy Theater Comique, to witness a special exhibition of this great educational film. The manager accepted the invitation and from what they were greatly pleased with both the reel and with Manager Keon's thoughtfulness in providing the picture. Mr. Keon told the World's New England representative that the Russell Sage Foundation, Department of Child Hygiene, of New York, is now planning to write a letter concerning the "Safe Fourth of July" to the mayor of every city in the United States, of 5,000 inhabitants or over, and another to the Chamber of Commerce and other organizations of that kind in the National Municipal League, and asking them to urge the exhibition of this Edison reel.

The New Lincoln Theater, which was started recently in Worcester, Mass., has suspended all building operations. The foundation is completed, but as further work is being done no one seems to know just what the hitch may be. The Worcester Amusement Company originally exploited this house, but something has evidently gone wrong with this corporation.

General Manager E. H. Gurtle, of the Congress Theater, Portland, Maine, has closed his house with a view to making extensive alterations, enlargements and general repairs. The house will be open again the first part of August, if the work progresses satisfactorily. This house is doing a tremendous business and has been running for over three years without any lapse. It is becoming a stronger favorite with the people as the house even more fitted, that he closed this summer.

Westwood Park, Dedham, Mass., will open July 3, for its annual summer season. A program of Licensed service "pop" vaudeville and songs will be offered. This park will give two shows daily, and is being operated by the Old Colony Street Railway Company. Westwood has quite a new business every summer, as do most of the parks in and about Massachusetts.

Manager John A. Burke, of the Elm Theater, New Bedford, Mass., intends to remain open during the entire summer, as good are the drawing powers of his "pop" vaudeville and pictures.

The Broadway Theater, Lawrence, Mass., is not to be operated by its original builders, as Messrs. Mercier & Morris have announced that they have sold the Broadway to Messrs. Connolly & Frankel. These two men will run a theater in Lynn, Mass., which shows good results. The Broadway is a large house, first-class in every way, and will offer "pop" vaudeville and pictures.

The pupils of the Central Grammar School, of Fitchburg, Mass., were guests of the Practical Arts School, during a full dress rehearsal of a Shakespeare classic. During the waits, between the acts, Cinematography made its bow, being presented by H. F. Jackson, general manager of the Bijou Amusement Company, and resident manager of the Bijou Theater, Fitchburg. The Bombardment of the Battleship Texas, a recent Licensed release, was the reel exhibited. It is understood that during the next school year in Fitchburg a moving picture machine is to be installed in the high school grammar School, and that Cinematography will be used as a regular part of the curriculum. It is pleasing to hear of a moving picture being exhibited on the same program with a Shakespearian classic. But who not?

Not to be outdone the Theater Comique, Salem, Mass., which invited public officials to be present at a private exhibition of the Edison "A Safe Fourth of July," and Board Members, of the Progressive Theater, Beverly, Mass., attended a most special of these exhibitions, action and comment by their liberality and charity. A police officer in Beverly was killed by an electric shock while on duty, owing to some faulty mechanical work. Messrs. Ware Brothers promptly set aside one whole day for the widow and six children of the unfortunate officer. The Dreamland was opened some hours earlier than usual, and as good was the result of people to the house, who wished to contribute to the fund, that unusually short shows were run off. The entire receipts for the day were forthwith handed over to the officer's wife.

The Ware Brothers state that this day's receipts made the most of the largest totals in the history of the Dreamland. Such methods as these are most praiseworthy, and the Moving Picture World takes pleasure in complimenting the Ware Brothers on their liberality and good sense. Such an act as this brings more favorable publicity (and business) to a moving picture theater, than almost any amount of advertising will bring.

In these columns this week we find three distinct ads which bode well for the picture—Messrs. Ware Brothers' charitable act, Manager Keon's exhibition of "Safe Fourth of July," and Manager H. F. Jackson's free exhibition of moving pictures for the Practical Arts School grammar children. It is a pleasure to note these facts in the World, and the World's New England representative is always happy to chronicle such matters in his columns.

HENRY.

Washington, D. C.

Lobby Decoration is something that always attracts the passerby and is a good advertising proclaims the house. The neatest poster holders to be seen here have recently made their appearance before the doors of the Empress, in the form of brass-framed glasses. These stand in easel form and are removable at any time. The manager has displayed much taste in taking this advanced step in motion picture advertisement. It appeals to the public.

The Leader has the distinction of using the only aluminum screen in the city. The projection here is among the best to be seen, and with the reduction of the size of the screen has been an improvement. Changing the screen to a smaller size, while the installation of the black velvet boxframe serves to bring out to better advantage the projected picture. With the addition of the lights ceiling wards, gives a mellow illumination, while the ventilation and fans make this theater exceedingly comfortable. Another feature is now being given the Leader by Manager Miller and his associates, and that is the comfort of their patrons. The comforts of its patrons is the ladies' retiring room. Recently a number of the shows were presented under the auspices of the Women's Clubs.

Jim Hawkins has added the capital City Park to his already large list of picture theaters. He and his manager are the popular wheeling pair.

The Educational Side of the motion picture industry was again brought into evidence recently when at the Columbia a motion picture, "Across the Land Up There." This was presented at the Columbia Theater by D. B. Dodds and gave a splendid insight into the customs and the geography of Alaska. At this season of the year is provided a delightful change to the usual run of productions, and the views served to reduce the existing temperature considerably. With snow and ice continually passing before one, one is bound to be influenced. The entire lecture was extremely interesting.

Perth Amboy, N. J.—Work has been started by the Hyme Company, of Perth Amboy, N. J., for the Royal Amusement Company, also of Perth Amboy, on a moving picture house to be known as the "Royal," at the corner of Smith and State streets. The Royal will be a theater with a frontage of 20 feet on Smith street, with a very attractive tiled floor entrance and a depth of 144 feet, with a seating capacity of 600 persons. It will cost approximately $20,000 to $40,000, and the building contractors expect to have same ready for occupancy by the middle of September, or about September 1st of this year. The house will have a sloping cement floor, with a seating capacity of about 650, and will be thoroughly fireproof and one of the best ventilated and most modern picture houses in the State. All conveniences will be installed for the comfort of the patrons, and special attention has been paid to the comfort of the operators. Instead of the usual small and poorly ventilated booth, the plans show that this room is to be about 19 feet in width by 9 feet in depth. The "Royal" will be under the management of Mr. William Brown, of Atlantic City, and Mr. David Sasper, of Perth Amboy, both of these gentlemen having had considerable experience in this line of business.

Pittsburg

The Cinemaphone, at 347-349 Fifth Avenue, is undoubtedly the leading Photoplay Theater running Licensed films in this city. This theater is always cool and well ventilated in the summer and heated at the right temperature in the winter, making it very comfortable at all times. The lights are placed in such a manner so as to be able to read a newspaper at almost any part of the house. The projection booth is one of the finest in the city, and is equipped with two latest model machines, employing two chief and two assistant operators. The seating capacity is 500, with standing room for 100 more. The floor is attended by ushers, in neat uniforms (furnished by J. M. Braddock), who are very polite and attentive to the patrons. A six-piece orchestra, under the leadership of George Wolbert, furnishes an additional feature to this ideal photoplay house. Miss Margaret Steerker is the pianist. Three first-run Licensed films from the General Film Co. are used, with an additional feature now and then. The Kalem "Unsex After the Battle" was strongly advertised by displaying two large 8½ x 11 American and Mexican flags, with numberless smaller flags of both nations scattered artistically about the lobby. Mr. G. B. Brenneman is the manager of this house.

Mr. Reuben Soltz, the enterprising manager and proprietor of the Majestic, at 1215 Fifth Avenue, states that he contemplates remodelling his theater in the most modern way about the end of July. The new Majestic will have a seating capacity of 800, and will be equipped with a modern, double asbestos booth, and the latest model machines. The booth will be raised to the second floor, and will have a floor space of 625 feet for each curtain. The lobby will be entirely remodelled. The Majestic, at present, seats 350, and has been running to capacity houses consistently in hot weather. One first-run Licensed reel and two older reels are used. A large theater organ furnishes the music. The policy of the Majestic is the opening, had been to run vaudeville with three films, about twenty reels, charging ten and five cents admission, but for the last six months, straight pictures have been used, charging five cents admission, with good results.

The Idle Hour, at 226 Diamond Street, one of the newer protoplay theaters in this city, has been running to fine business. The manager is Mr. Paul M. Huhn, and although a new entry in the moving picture field, has shown himself to be very capable. The booth is equipped in the most modern way, with a double asbestos booth, using two No. 6 Powers machines, equipped with special Grundlach lenses. The booth has been treated with a silver coating, making the projection very praiseworthy. First-run films are used, being rented by the Pittsburg Photoplay Co. Mr. Chris. Vollmer is the proprietor of this house.

Mr. Herman Hyman, of Erie, is the person suggesting the best name for the new theater at 335 Fifth Avenue. Roses were given to the ladies in the matinee on July 4, the first day opened by the proprietors. Mr. Herman Hyman, formerly manager of the Olympic, American and the Glen theaters, will have the management. Harry Steinberg is operating. This house is equipped with an up-to-date fireproof booth, using two No. 6 Powers machines. The curtain is 12½ x 14. First-run independent pictures are used, from Path. Photoplay Co. is arranged. From the new law, the house has only 300 seats, but the seating capacity could be enlarged to 450.

At the grand opening of the Lyric Theater, 1018 Penn Avenue, Wilkensburg, carnations were given to the ladies, and good, run Independent pictures were shown to all who attended. The manager is Mr. Lee J. Warner, formerly manager of the Grand Opera House, Youngstown, O. The projection was especially commendatory, and the credit should be given to the operator, Mr. J. J. Prentz. This theater prides itself in being the best ventilated house in Wilkinsburg.

The Scenic Theater, on Market Street, across the street from the Pastime, has been closed for the last couple of weeks. It is the same old story of survival of the fittest, there was only room for one and the Pastime is still there.

The Rex Theater, at 6017 Penn Avenue, E. E., has installed a $5,000 organ. On Saturday, June 24, fans were given to the patrons. Max Herring is the general manager.

As a lobby display for the Essanay Automobile Race film, the Avenue at 4731 Penn Street, Bloomfield, displayed a Packard automobile in the lobby, and the receipts raced away above expectations. Messrs. Fred Lacy and Wm. Le Barron are the enterprising proprietors. They also ran the talking moving pictures with great results. The proprietors contemplate extensive alterations before the first of September, their object being to extend the house back to an alley, and to add 100 more seats to the present 200. The house is well equipped with a fireproof booth and two Edison one-pin machines are used. It is well ventilated, using two exhaust fans and 8 wall fans. Late run Licensed films from General Film Co., are used.

The Duquesne, under the management of Harry Davis, using the Harry Davis Stock Co., is running moving pictures for the summer months. 4 old Licensed reels are used. Mr. J. A. Davis is the operator.

SELIG.

THE NEW FAITH.—Claus Valerius a Roman patrician, wounded at the head of his Legion, came to his country home to recuperate, accompanied by his friend Epicurus, an old Roman voluptuary. Loitering about his beautiful grounds one day, he came upon one of his servants, a young female slave, so deeply engrossed in reading from a scroll that she was entirely unconscious of his presence. Curious at seeing so much knowledge in a young girl, he asked her to read her tablets and found her to belong to that strange new sect called Christians.

He talked much with her and became interested as the beauties of her faith were unfolded to him, and he realized its spirituality and unselfishness, especially when contrasted with the sodden materialism of old Epicurus, who wished to have her whipped. One day as he slept on a bench in the garden, a great tarantula crept fearfully close to his neck. The slave girl, at the risk of her life, dashed it to the ground, and more than ever Valerius decided at the Christian spirit of self-sacrifice.

To put her to the test, he agreed with Epicurus that her life should be thereafter spared if she did not sacrifice to Venus, and she was willing to die by torture rather than do so. More and more the sweet influence of the girl grew upon Valerius and the greedy old Epicurus, seeing how things were going, hastened back to Rome to denounce Caligula, secure the forfeiture of his estates, and so feather his own nest.

Realizing at last that he loved the girl, Valerius called her to him and wished to confer upon her the honor of concubinage, but the high principle she esteemed it not an honor but an ignominy, and confessing her love for him, preferred death to shame.

At last love, pure and holy, conquered him and he sought her out to tell her that he would marry her according to her Christian rites, but it was too late. Epicurus and a soldier, bearing the mandate of Caligula approached. Even now they triumphed over the cruelty of the Emperor by dying in each other's arms.

THE WHITE MEDICINE MAN.—This little comedy is based upon the well known ease with which Indians may be hypnotized. Hypnotized without a struggle and prove most docile subjects, they are tremendously fond of slight of hand and feats of dexterity, and all over the Southwest they swarm in great numbers to little tent and canvas shows of the circus attracts them for many miles around. It is quite impossible for them to dissemble in their minds like the purely skillful Pawnee, and when the "Great Herrman" first visited the Southwestern tier of territories he was invested by the Indians with where, with mesmerism.

Old Sitting Horse, a brave of the Yuma tribe, takes his daughter to a show one evening and sees him pay "Prof. A. Leclerque, accompanied by the Fascinating Miss Julie," and there see all the wonders of the "Hat and Handkerchief Trick," "Sword and Hamper," the "Disappearing Lady," and most wonderful of all, the taming and feeding of a wild and woolly cowboy by lady-power.

He is so impressed with the powers of the professor that when, next day, his daughter is kicked by a broncho, and the medicine man of the tribe is unable to help her, he literally kidnaps the much alarmed professor and takes him to his home. The showman finds a way out of his predicament by hypnotizing the Indians and is about to make his escape when his wife sees what he is doing to the girl and she recovers. In their joy over the restoration the Indians insist that the professor remain with them, but he cannot see that, and again he resorts to mesmerism to get away from them. But in his van and home the Indians are mystified and wondering more than ever at his occult disappearance, bag and baggage.

A CRAVEN HEART.—Rose and Roy are engaged to be married, and he is happy in the security of her love. When a foreign count appears on the scene, being ambitious to shine in the world of titles, Rose decides to renounce Roy, whom she really loves, and accept the count. Her father consents and, finding that the absence of his suit, he leaves, only to be confronted by his deserted wife, who has followed him from Europe. Not wishing to be seen, the count steps into his machine and they drive to her hotel to discuss matters.

Roy has seen this meeting and hailing an auto he starts in pursuit, following them into her hotel. Here Rose sees some detective from the count succeeds in pacifying his wife. But Roy has discovered the situation and determines to face the count in his dignity. The count, seeing no way to leave, is surprised by Roy and a fierce fight ensues. Madame tries to separate them and failing, screams for help. Madame has a lighted lamp. In his fury the count seizes the lamp and hurls it at Roy, who luckily dodges it. It explodes, setting fire to the scene, their own evening of escape.

The fire alarm is turned in and an exciting and terrible one is the result of the rush of frightening what is has done, the count rushes to the window, calling for help, and when the firemen reach it with the ladder, he would have descended first, but is thrown aside by Roy, who assists the firemen in rescuing the woman. He then permits the count to follow, himself bringing up the rear.

The situation is a perilous one, and the ladder-over burdened with its human weight, gives way, hurling the count to the ground. Roy springs desperately to the upper portion until another ladder is raised and he is then rescued, only to discover that the count has been killed. Roy is taken to a hospital badly burned. Madame then tells Rose the story, and together they visit Roy, where he and Bess are reconciled.

TWO LIVES.—Brown and Clayton are college chums. Brown's father fails in business, and the latter leaves college, and after a brief financial grit, goes to work in a great steel mill, where his fine character and true worth soon attract to him the star ball-player at college, wins for him rapid advancement.

Clayton becomes a financier, and he devotes his life to money making. The rich man snubs his former chum because he is a workman, and the two soon part in anger.

Brown is seen amidst most interesting scenes in the foundry and machine shops of a great steel plant, contented with his work. Clayton worships only money, and his selfishness causes a respectable old merchant to kill himself.

Brown marries for love, and in his modest home with his wife and baby boy, he realizes heaven on earth. Clayton also marries a wealthy society girl, elopes with one of her own kind.

Time tells a story. Fortune to the two men. Clayton sees his money in speculation, and sinks to the gutter. Brown giving alms to a ragged bum recognizes in the unfortunate his old college chum. For "Auld lang syne" Brown gives the begging hand to Clayton and secures work for him in the steel mills.

IT HAPPENED IN THE WEST.—Gordon Dereau drifted to Arizona, where he married a young Indian maiden, Alcinda, daughter of a wealthy brother died. Among his papers were found proofs that cleared Gordon's name, and his mother sent for soldier boy. Learning of this Gordon refused but the soldier, working on the poor Indian woman's better nature, succeeded in prevailing upon her to give her child. She made the boy's sake. But in agony of love, she fastened one end of a lasso around her and the other and kept the other. Gordon found the other the one she had fastened in little Jack's stirrup, when well on his way, and learned the secret of the truth, but it was too late, the prodigal returned to his mother's arms and forgiveness.

Years passed by and Jack was given his twenty-first birthday party. Sir Gordon felt that the time had come at last to tell the boy of his origin, but he could no longer withhold the truth, and sadly he told him all, giving him the little amulet. Poor Jack was stunned by the blow. What effect would it have upon his sweetheart? But first he made his father tell him all, and repented having blighted the life of his mother. Even as they talked, the squaw wife, now wrinkled, haggard and old, lay dying at the old home in Arizona, babbling in her delirium to her lips a strange and sad contrast to the fashionable surroundings of her husband's home.

That night as they walked in the garden after the dance, Jack told his sweetheart of his origin and she was shocked at the story. But the poor fellow saw the truth—that she could not sully her lineage, and that they must part. In anguish of mind he rode away to the Arizona home to find his mother. Despite his father's entreaties, he took away.

Arrived at the old ranch, he found a friend in an old Indian who took him to his mother's grave, and there among others of his tribe he found the call of his blood urging him to new sympathies and a new peace. He learned from a maiden how his mother had loved him and had given his little moccasin at her lips, and now it was Sir Gordon's turn to find the incongruities that his poor Indian wife had known for so many weary years.

WASHINGTON RELICS.—This film tells the life story of the father of his country by showing the scenes and things closely connected with his illustrious career. Washington's birthplace at Wakefield on the Potomac, Alexandria, where he helped to survey when he was 16 years old, old Christ Church, where he worshipped, Carlyle House, where he received his commission as major in the British army, its headquarters at Valley Forge, the old mansion at Mount Vernon, the Continental army went through such hardships of starvation and cold, Independence Hall, Philadelphia, where he received his appointment as commander in chief, Betsy Ross's house, where he, in company with two other gentlemen, received the first flag of the Union. Following, where he accomplished the unprecedented victory and received the surrender of Cornwallis. The remains of the home where he spent his honeymoon. Pictures of his swords, uniform and Revolutionary money follow. Some of his letters, showing his signature and relics his magnificent home to which he retired to private life. Relics of his friend Franklin, with the simple but always touching tomb. The film ends with a picture of Washington and the flag in honor and makes a unique and absolutely unsurpassed picture for a 4th of July celebration.

A BALD LIE.—John Jones has a bald head and a jealous wife, which, to say the least, is a very bad combination. Also John has a long letter and is very fond of the society of pretty young ladies. This leads to many unhappy occurrences in his home, and finally to a catastrophe. He receives a telegram from some of his cronies, requesting his immediate presence, but this doesn't work and Jones is deported. Finally he sees an advertisement for Hair-Go, a marvelous tonic which has been known to grow hair on a cocoanut or a marble-top table. On the plea that he is going to get some of this, that he may be able to go and buy a bottle, but does not return home. Instead, he soon finds himself in the company of some gay companions in one of the Parisian cafés, and where one of the girls, after hearing him talk about the tonic, persuades him to let her anoint him with it. He rubs some on, and while she forms the letters on his head—well, we won't tell you what she put on, but it grew a most beautiful crop of hair, and when Jones went home his wife got the message painted on his ivory top piece; and what happened after that is too good to spoil with the telling.

AN INDIAN'S PRIDE.—Within a short distance of each other dwell a cowboy and a young Indian and his wife. The Indian and the pale-faces exchange tokens of friendship, and everything is peaceful in the beautiful little valley. In the trapper's camp, however, are a couple of crooks, who steal what money the half-breed and leave by a trail leading to the Indian's wigwam. Naturally, the poor red man is suspected, and the cowboy gives him time to come and hurt the lepers. The next day Iron Wolf, the Indian, is assumed to overhear the two crooks discussing their ill-gotten gains. This conversation ends in a pistol fight in which one is killed and the other flees. Iron Wolf is thereupon given confession of the wounded man and starts in pursuit of the culprit, on his way he is intercepted by the trapper's two little children, who are borne flashing through the rapids of the mountain stream beneath the bridge to be revenged and the natural intelligence of the Indian children quickly decides upon the latter course and rescues them in a most thrilling manner. When Iron Wolf returns the children to their parents he sees seated on the porch the thief and quickly accuses him. There follows a struggle in which the Indian is victorious, and sustaining the bag of money from the bosom of the vanquished man, he throws it at the feet of the chief, shakes off the dust.

ALONG THE DANUBE.—This is a marvelously beautiful film, showing a trip up the Danube from Passau to Vienna. The scenes on the picturesque waters of the river we pass between which marks the frontier between Austria and Germany, a further glimpse of the city of Linz, and next we pass to Greinburg Castle. Then the scene of the battle fought on this river in 1809 then Mathaud Schaufenal, the Convent Castle of the Servites then Aggstein, the old castles of Hinterhaus and Schoenbuhel then St. Michael and the Fortress of Durnstein, in which King Leopold of imprisoned Richard the Lion Hearted, and finally our voyage ends at the quaint village of Stein, making it an enjoyable and entertaining film.

WAITING.—The first scene in this pathetic story shows a young fellow and his sweetheart. He proposes and is accepted. The heartless father, thought he agrees to the match, says that the girl is too young and advises the young man to go West and to wait a few years. This he does and the years pass and he makes good on his ranch, and one day he receives a letter from his sweetheart, telling him that she is now grown at last and to have everything ready for their wedding. Of course, he does everything in grand style, there are invitations, the house decorated with flowers, the neighbors are all invited, and finally the old negro servant, who has been waiting on his master, goes, he leaves for the station, but before he goes he gathers a little message for his sweetheart.

At the station he has to wait for almost train time the anxious young man looks expectantly down the track, when suddenly the ticket office catches the telegraph operator. He has in his hand a message, and handing it to the happy groom, the latter reads it. Then to his agent, Red Gulch, Cannon Ball Express gone over the bridge three miles east of Red Gulch. All on board killed." Gradually the intelligence fades from the eyes of the disappointed man and in a dazed condition he leaves the station, only to be met by a waiters from on the station platform. These and he quickly hands he is brought back to his decked home. Years and years roll over the head and every Thursday he gathers a little bouquet and wending his way to the railroad he drives away to the station to meet his bride, who never comes. Finally after one of these trips he comes home alone and sinks into a chair, overcome by grief. In his lonely moments he grasps the picture of his bride and with his eyes fixed upon her finally succumbs and sinks into the realm of his love, where he will be with her forever.

by the beauty of this homely lady and he decides to make her acquaintance with a view of gaining her love.

He learns that the film was made in Paris and also learns the name of the company which produced it. He then goes immediately to the city and on his arrival attempts to obtain Miss Viola's address from the film manufacturers and failing in this, awaits at the entrance to the studio. By his compliments he wins her friendship, but meets with active opposition from her mother. When absolutely forbidden to call upon Miss Viola, in order to be near her, he secures a position as moving picture actor with the concern for which she works. Here during the producing of a comedy play he is badly hurt in an accident. Viola, who has learned to love him, insists upon nursing him until his recovery. The mother now withdraws her opposition to his suit and a wedding is arranged. Not until after the wedding does Viola learn that Harry is wealthy.

A RAGGED COAST.—Showing the breakers and wild waves along the Catalonian Coast and some of the few ancient Roman ruins now remaining in Spain.

A VILLAGE KING LEAR.—A blind father is prevailed upon to transfer his property to his two daughters, who promise to look after him properly. The elder daughter, with whom he first makes his home, is kind for a short time, but attending to the requirements of a blind man soon becomes irksome, and she gradually relaxes her attentions and finally looks upon the old man as a great nuisance, and neglects him. After a time she loses all patience with his untimely and rather than be troubled with him any longer, takes him to the house of her younger sister. The younger sister is equally unwilling to give him the attention he needs, and heartbroken by the base ingratitude of his daughters, the old man leaves the house and his old servant. And him wandering helplessly about the village. Knowing the condition upon which the gift was made, they take him to the solicitor's office, where a meeting is arranged with his daughters. The elder daughter, in order to avoid the scandal which is otherwise bound to arise, puts the best face she can upon the matter by pretending a certain amount of affection for her father and takes him home again, where, perhaps feeling some small amount of remorse on account of what has transpired, she treats him with more compassion.

SAVING THE STANDARD.—During the Netherlands War of Independence, the Prince of Courtray lays siege to the castle of the Duke of Brabant, and the duke and his daughter are made prisoners in their own castle.

The prince, to commemorate his victory, takes the precious standard of the Brabant House, which he wrests forcibly from the hands of the daughter and tramples it under foot, and carries it to his own quarters and triumphantly sets it up at the foot of his bed. Subsequently joining his officers at a banquet in celebration of their success. Under cover of night, the daughter creeps past the sentries, enters the conqueror's apartment, and wrapping the standard around her, glides back to her father and presents it to him. The prince discovers his loss, but before he can recover the standard, the soldiers of the Duke of Flanders arrive, and taking the prince's troops by surprise, force their way into the castle, completely routing the usurpers.

THE CUTTLE FISH.—We first see them pursuing prawns, which form their chief article of diet. Then they are seen when attacked by enemies. At such times they eject a black fluid, which clouds the water and so enables them to escape, and bury themselves in the sand, where it becomes difficult to distinguish them.

LUBIN.

ALWAYS A WAY.—Ruth Craven and Harry Sterling were sweethearts. Ruth lived with her brother, the Rev. John Craven, and her maiden Aunt Ellen.

The Rev. John Craven did not share his sister's admiration for Mr. Sterling. When the young man appeared in his house to ask for the hand of Ruth, the Rev. Mr. Craven refused his request in no uncertain terms.

After that Harry and Ruth met secretly. Finally they decided to elope. Harry enlisted the services of his friend, Albert Pierce, who owned an automobile. He also secured the assistance of Josh, the village constable.

The three hid the machine behind a hedge and when they saw the Rev. Mr. Craven and dear Aunt Ellen leave the house on their way to church, Harry pried open a window and soon had released Ruth from her room in which the minister had locked her. Oh, but it looked easy.

Suddenly a noise made the elopers' hearts jump into their throats. The minister had returned to get a forgotten prayer book. Ruth jumped back into her room and Harry was making his rapid get-away through the window, when the minister nabbed him. The Rev. Mr. Craven sent for the police.

Now, Josh was the whole police force of the village, and when he appeared, he tipped Harry the wink and led him away. In the meantime, Ruth had escaped. Then they decided to play a joke on the minister. They disguised themselves as Italians, and appeared before the Rev. Mr. Craven, telling him, through an "interpreter," that they wished to be married in the Christian manner. The ceremony was performed and then Harry and Edith pulled off their wigs and showed that love had found a way.

THE SNARE OF SOCIETY.—Arthur Williams and his young wife were extremely happy in their beautiful home. One day Arthur returned home with a beautiful ring for which his wife had expressed a wish. That day she attended a bridge-whist party. She was unsuccessful in playing and lost all her money. She conceived the daring scheme of stealing home and taking a large amount of money from a vault, where Arthur was accustomed to keep his surplus cash. Still bad luck pursued her. Finally Jack Read offered to loan her a large amount. Mary declined to take it, but finally yielded on condition that he would accept as security the ring.

The next day Arthur at his club overheard Jack mention his wife's name, and showing the ring. Arthur demanded an explanation. Jack refused to give it. Then he returned home. He told his wife of the occurrence at the club and asked her what it meant. Mary admitted that she had given Jack the ring. Fearing that his wife was not true to him, Arthur left the house. Then Mary determined to quickly clear up the whole affair.

Taking with her a small revolver, she went to Jack's apartments. She demanded the ring. Jack laughed. Being in a submissive mood, he suggested that they put the cards to ascertain whether she should take the ring or whether he should take her. Mary agreed, reserving to her own mind an escape that he should win. Jack cut first—a king. Mary picked up the cards and threw an ace. Catching up the precious ring she hurried home, where she quickly explained to her husband the whole affair.

THE LOST HORSE.—When Squire Wilson, of Clayville, lost a valuable horse, he advertised very extensively for it, and finally offered a reward of two hundred dollars for the return of a bay horse with a white star in its forehead.

Now Sam is another boy, and a mean one at that. It was a bay horse with a white star in its forehead that Sam found. Being an ingenious boy, Sam quickly put a white star there with paint. Then he went out and led the horse up the road until he saw a boy coming over a hill. Then Sam began to cry, and when the boy came up he asked him what was the matter. When the boy learned that Sam had lost a horse he told him that he had found one. Sam asked him to describe it, and when he found this horse described exactly like his own he wanted to lend the horse to Sam and ride it for fifty dollars. When part of this money was bought Sam gave the boy the horse to ride and on his forehead Sam re-painted immediately as the road supported the performance. Sam mounted then and said his second good-by. Then Sam was seen coming out of a little road, He did the same with the two other horses and was rapidly increasing in fortune.

Then Sam "the boy" was soon prominently appointed as Squire Wilson's horse in the squire's farm. The Squire discovered everything of any of the horses and showed that the horse which Sam knew was paint. Then the victims started out to hunt for Sam. They found him counting his ill-begotten gains. Sam saw them coming and got a little start but rage lent speed to the legs of his pursuers, and they quickly overtook him.

After giving the stable financier a good beating, he was led off to the lock-up by the town constable, who had been one of his victims.

MR. INQUISITIVE.—Mr. Inquisitive was one of those good creatures who believe in learning something new every day. One day he saw a milk man performing his labors and started to investigate personally just how the milk was poured out with the result that it was all poured over him. The next thing he saw was a steam shovel at work. He did not quite understand how that was operated, so he proceeded to look into the matter, with the result that the machine gathered him up together with the rest of the dirt. He then wandered into a Wild West show, and tried to discover how to throw a lasso. The cowboys handled him even more roughly than the steam shovel.

THE GREAT HEART OF THE WEST.—Jack's lungs were badly affected and his doctor ordered him West, but Jack knew the sacrifice it would be to his mother to send him there and demurred. His mother was firm, however, and gave her small hoard to send him to California.

On the day that Jack arrived at Santa Paula he was a sick week that he attracted the attention of a kindly disposed stranger, who passed the hat among the crowd and collected quite a sum, which he pressed into the hand of the reluctant boy. He also directed him to a ranch where he found employment and immediately began to mend. It was not many weeks before he was strong and well and the feeling of the West had entered his blood.

He wrote his mother an encouraging letter and returned the money she had advanced him.

One day, while riding to herd his cattle, Jack came upon Mary Gray, who lived with her brother at a neighboring ranch. Mary's horse had run away and she was in despair as to how to reach home before dark.

Jack offered his own mount and accompanied her home and soon they were fast friends. Mary would come to ride with him while he was watching his herd, and love began to spring as the buds do after the snow has passed.

It was not many months before Jack sent for his mother to join him in his new home, and great was the good lady's surprise to be introduced to her son's fiancée and invited to the wedding, which was to occur the next day. Having found the great heart of the West and his heart's happiness, Jack resolved to stay there where he could continue healthy and strong.

IN THE RIGHT OF WAY.—John Burton, a railroad clerk from the East, was spending his vacation hunting in the wild lands about John Walsh's shack. One morning, as he was eagerly following a large hawk, which he had already wounded, he lost his balance on the edge of a cliff and plunged down to the stony ground below. His cries for help attracted Walsh's attention and he was taken to the latter's cabin, where he was tenderly cared for by Walsh and his wife, until he was able to return to his duties in the East.

Walsh's wife was the apple of his eye, but, like most things that we love, she did not last, and twenty years later we find him a broken old man, living in the days that are gone.

Walsh had heard about the new railroad which was to run in his neighborhood, and one day was surprised to find the construction gangs on his property, trampling around in the vicinity of his wife's grave. He threatened them with his shot gun and angrily ordered them off, and when the sheriff later appeared, with a writ of eviction, he ordered him away.

The chief engineer received a letter about this time, saying that the president of the road was not satisfied with the progress made and was personally coming to superintend the work.

Walsh was the stumbling block in the engineer's path, and so he armed his men and ordered them to eject Walsh by force.

A spirited exchange of shots was in evidence when the president arrived and he was just in time to see his men bring the wounded Walsh from his cabin, while they set about destroying it.

The recognition between the two old friends was mutual, for the president was Burton, the former railroad clerk, whose life Walsh had saved.

Walsh led the way to the grave of his wife, and explained his reasons for not wanting to vacate the land where all that he held sacred rested in peace. Burton sympathized deeply with his old friend, and arranged with his engineer to make a wide detour about the property, so that the memory of the dead might be respected.

STUBB'S NEW SERVANTS.—The old servants—man and maid—leave to get married, and Mr. and Mrs. Stubbs decide to do their own work. It grows monotonous, however, and each engages a servant unknown to the other. Later, Mr. Stubbs, upon looking through his window, sees what seems to be Mrs. Stubbs in the gardener's arms. Mrs. Stubbs has a like shock from her window. A separation is imminent until the mystery is cleared.

THE WONDERFUL EYE.—A stranded theatrical troupe manages to get back home through the leading man finding a glass eye. An idea strikes him. He buys a bag of walnuts and the comedian later also buys a bag. The leading man then goes to the fruit dealer, offering him $100 for the return of his glass eye, and saying he will return later in view of his finding it. The comedian enters, stating he found a glass eye in the bag of walnuts he bought. The fruit seller pays him $50 for it. He is still waiting for the $100 and the troupe is back in New York.

THE THIEF AND THE GIRL.—A gentleman thief has for a sweetheart and accomplice a maid, whose plan it is to get employment in a house and tip him off as to the lay of the land. While waiting for her in an adjoining park, he meets a pretty little girl and is deeply impressed by her innocence and candor. Her purity and honesty almost make him loathe himself. The night of the job arrives and the thief and his assistant wait outside for the maid's signal, which comes immediately, as she has seized a favorable opportunity, when all the folks are out. An entrance is effected, but a slight noise arouses the daughter, who is still at home. She tells the butler, who has just returned, her fears, and he manages to surprise the assistant, the real burglar being behind a screen. You may imagine the thief's amazement when he discovers that the daughter is the girl he met in the park. Through a clever move he manages to drive his assistant off and leave the home himself, in a better frame of mind. Upon reaching the park, where his sweetheart, the maid, is waiting, he tells her he is through with that life for good and intends to take the better road, which she is delighted to hear.

ESSANAY.

SWAT THE FLY.—Mr. McSwatt and his wife are at breakfast and very much troubled by flies, which swarm over their plates and otherwise annoy them. McSwatt suddenly rises and, using his newspaper, makes a savage smash at the swarm, and begins chasing them around the room, his wife following, shooing her apron after him. Stumbling into the bedroom, McSwatt falls, striking his head against the foot of the bureau, which causes him to lose his senses, and rising, he imagines he sees a large swarm of flies directly in front of him, which he chases to the window and down the street. He passes a woman and makes a smash at her hat with his paper. After numerous other adventures, McSwatt arrives home, where his wife is trying to shoo a miller out of the house. It is night and an officer passing by sees the shadows of the two persons against the curtain. To him it appears that McSwatt is trying to club his wife and, dashing into the house, he gives the little fellow a hard rap on the head with his club, which restores McSwatt's senses. McSwatt's wife then explains that they have been trying to catch a moth and the policeman, apologizing, bids them good night and goes out.

A HUNGRY PAIR.—Two hobos, Shorty and Skinny, are very hungry, and finally Skinny gets an idea how to get a good meal without paying for it. Stealing a policeman's suit which is hanging on a line in a nearby yard, Skinny is dressed in it and they go to a restaurant, which Shorty enters, and seating himself, orders a large meal. After Shorty has finished, he begins acting crazily and the proprietor goes to the door and calls a policeman. Shorty is then arrested and led away by Skinny, who takes of the policeman's suit and puts it on Shorty. Skinny then returns to the restaurant, and, ordering a large meal, eats until he has reached the bursting point, when he starts to smash up the china with the intention of being arrested by Shorty. However, Shorty, having been well fed, has laid down on the steps outside and gone to sleep and a real policeman coming on the scene, goes in and arrests Skinny. Skinny is led away while Shorty looks after them in surprise.

AT THE BREAK OF DAWN.—Young Gilbert Randel, an American surveyor, is sent to Mexico with a construction gang, and quartered in a small Mexican village, meets Pepita, a beautiful Mexican girl, with whom he falls in love. After frequent visits to the cottage of Pepita, Gilbert proposes to the girl and she consents to the marriage. A few days elapse and Randel receives a telegram from headquarters in New York, that he is to return immediately. Five years elapse when Pedro, who has always loved Pepita, and who had endeavored to make her believe that Randel would never return, sees the latter at a small hotel in the village in the company of an American girl. It is late at night when Pedro comes to Pepita's home and tells her of having seen her husband. Early in the morning, Pepita kisses her little one good-bye, and runs madly from the house, with the intention of finding her husband. Stumbling on a hillside path, she is horrified to see a glare of light from the mountain in the distance. Unaware of her danger, she lingers, looking on, when suddenly the hill on which she stands seems to shake, and stumbling, she falls to her death in a crevice. Pedro, who has followed her, comes running on the scene at this time, and with difficulty draws the dead body of the girl on beside him. The rays of the rising sun finds the Mexican on his knees beside the dead body of his sweetheart.

KEEP YOUR DRUM HEADS DRY

The very nature of drum heads causes them to absorb moisture readily, and when the heads become damp it is an absolute certainty that your drum will lose its brilliancy.

Our latest invention, the Electric Drum Heater, entirely overcomes this difficulty, for by its use you can keep your drum brilliant and snappy regardless of the weather.

This device can be attached to any drum and the connecting plug will fit any ordinary 110-volt incandescent lamp socket. It gives no light; never burns out; may be turned on and off at will, or if desired, entirely removed in a few seconds time. Entire outfit, including the Heater proper, two connecting plugs, and six feet of cord, weighs eight ounces—the Heater but two. It is practically indestructible and can easily be carried in your drum case.

Be sure and say whether you wish it for Snare Drum, Bass Drum, or Tympani, as each instrument requires a different strength.

THE CORPORATION AND THE RANCH GIRL.—Upon the death of her father Ann Newton is made the heiress of an extensive and valuable ranch in Arizona, which she is visited by the officials of the W. railroad company, who, wishing to extend the tracks of their company, find it necessary to lay a portion of the ranch. Ann refuses to part with the ranch at any price, and the railroad officials find it necessary to take other steps in order to procure the property. Gerald Todd, son of the president of the company, is disguised as a cowpuncher and sent out to get a job on the Newton ranch, with the view of his winning the girl's love and her property. Gerald is given a job, and it is not long before Ann is smitten with his good looks on the other hand Gerald, who is really in love with Ann, has determined not to take advantage of Ann's affections, when he receives a note from his father urging him to make haste and persuade Miss Newton to part with the property. Gerald has already told Ann of his love, and she, finding this better, is easily led to believe that Gerald's love-making was used as a means of persuading her to part with her property, and she orders the young man out of the house. However Gerald finally proves to her that his love is sincere by writing to his father and telling the latter that Ann and he had decided not to sell the ranch.

MUSTANG PETE'S LOVE AFFAIR.—In Smokeville there are two rival boarding houses, one run by Mrs. Riley, and the other by Mrs. Dugan. Both of these Irish ladies are splendid cooks, but the boys at Smokeville, including "Alkali Ike" and "Mustang Pete," seem to favor Mrs. Riley, who gets all the trade. So Mrs. Dugan goes to the city to look for a pretty girl, who can draw trade. Lizzie Ryan appears to her, so she takes her back. Just as everybody is going out to lunch, Mrs. Dugan tells Lizzie that she must walk the main street to see if she can bring boarders to her house. Everybody comes to her, including "Mustang Pete," who tells Lizzie that he loves her. He is rejected, designing to make himself appear a hero in Lizzie's eyes, he induces "Alkali" to fight a duel, in which he is supposed to be killed, but when Mrs. Riley enters, and on seeing the outstretched form of her lover on the ground, she turns to "Alkali," and takes him to her heart, of course this is a big surprise to the boys, as none suspected that "Alkali" was the favored suitor, and the episode ends in "Mustang Pete" finally relinquishing his cling and congratulating the couple.

EDISON.

MARVELS OF HORSEMANSHIP.—This film was taken by special permission of Colonel Joseph Gerard, 15th U. S. Cavalry, and shows an exhibition of horseback riding including jumping over hurdles, in which the men ride one, two and three horses, jumping over them, standing backwards, standing on their heads, in fact doing all sorts of inconceivable things. Next we are shown an exhibition of Cossack riding with saddles and stirrups. This is no less remarkable than the bareback work, and the scene showing the men tearing down the field, picking up pieces of paper from the ground, is truly thrilling. Next we are shown some high jumping in which, after several attempts, a six-foot jump is made.

The closing part of the film consists of a fancy drill by thirty-two men besides the color bearer and officer in command, who go through a series of evolutions, forming circles, squares, crosses, galloping in and out.

THE TRAPPER'S FIVE DOLLAR BILL.—Just because Hank Bilbo, who lives in the backwoods of the Cumberland mountains, sold two fox skins for a crisp, new five-dollar bill, and wouldn't buy his wife, Aurelia, a new pair of shoes, she started a quarrel, which ended in poking the oven of the old cart and driving to the nearest Justice of the Peace in quest of a divorce.

Thaddeus Widdup, the Justice of the Peace, after hearing the case, decides to grant them a separation. Hank has but five dollars, which the judge pockets and conveniently makes that amount the regular price of a divorce. Aurelia then puts in a claim for five dollars alimony, to enable her to buy a much needed pair of shoes. The judge decides in her favor and orders Hank to produce the amount within twenty four hours.

That night the judge is held up and relieved of that crisp, new five-dollar bill at the point of a double-barreled shot gun, the robber compelling him to roll up the five-dollar bill and stick it into the muzzle of the gun.

The next day Hank is promptly on hand and in the presence of the judge, pays Aurelia the alimony with a new five-dollar bill, that has an indication to curl up as though it had been inserted into the end of a gun barrel. The judge eyes it but makes no comment, giving each a peculiarly worded document which, after reading, causes them to regret taking such a hasty step. Then and there they become reconciled and are about to go back to their log cabin, when the judge reminds them that they are no longer man and wife but stands prepared to perform the solemn ceremony of marriage, the fee in this particular case to be five dollars. Aurelia quickly pays the price and the curling five-dollar bill once more finds its way into the judge's pocket and Hank and Aurelia climb into the old cart and go home happy.

The scene then moves to Concord Bridge. Here the Minute Men take the initiative, and led by our brave dame assume heavily across the bridge and defeat the regulars. The retreat continues along the roads to Boston, the Minute Men picking them off from behind the trees and rocks until the regulars become panic-stricken and the retreat soon turns into a rout.

His wife tries to prevent his entering, which only confirms his suspicions, and he puts her aside. As he is about to enter the room the door opens and he is confronted by the officer. He raises his gun to fire, but his wife springing before him, begs for mercy for the officer, giving his own life to save their child. He slowly lowers his gun, hangs his head in shame, and asks the officer's forgiveness, which is freely given. The gallant young British aristocrat and the Minute Man warmly clasp each other's hand.

Thinking to cheer him up one of them produces a bottle of whiskey, but Reddy with thanks. The next day Reddy again visits the Palace restaurant. After finishing his meal he rolls and lights a cigarette. Patricia tells him she doesn't like a fellow who smokes cigarettes. This forces Reddy closer to the after-dinner pleasure. That night at the ranch he unconsciously pulls his cigarette papers and pouch of tobacco from his pocket and rolls a cigarette. Just as he is about to place it to his lips he thinks of Patricia's statement and hands the cigarette papers and tobacco from his pocket to Spike. This causes a lot of fun at Reddy's expense. During the boys' absence in town Patricia has been mystified at Reddy's conduct and they decide to trail him when he next leaves for town. Having made up a subterfuge for leaving, Reddy fixes himself up in a new suit of store clothes and starts for the restaurant trailed by the entire ranch outfit. VITAGRAPH.

THE OLD FOLKS' SACRIFICE (July 11).—The kindly old peddler and his wife have been saving from their small earnings enough to buy for themselves a home to shelter them in their old age. An only daughter, who lives in another part of the country, dies and leaves a son about six years of age. Unable to tell his father, a shiftless no-account, sends the boy to the grandparents to be taken care of by them.

Try as they may, the boy does not show an aptitude for learning or an appreciation of their efforts. After they have retired for the night he throws his school books into the fire and leaving a note telling of his departure, runs away. The old folks search for every trace of the boy, without avail.

Two or three years later they have accumulated enough money to purchase their home and visit a lawyer to have the deeds drawn up. Waiting for this to be done, the old peddler picks up a newspaper lying on the lawyer's table and reads of the arrest and imprisonment of his grandson. They decide to go to the boy's rescue, and with the purchase of their home and spedding the money for the journey in his defense.

Going to the prison, the young fellow is led from his cell. They tell him of their intentions, leaving him with the knowledge that he passes it with an avaricious stare.

Returning to their tenement they sit in a happy contemplation of the kind, convinced that they are doing the Lord's will in making a sacrifice that will result in the redemption of their grandson and they are blessed in this thought.

IN THE ARCTIC NIGHT (July 12th).—A college preceptor and post-graduate in the theological department of the Bible school where Eleanore Davis is very much esteemed and admired by all of his associates. He has a human as well as a devout side to his nature and this is very evident when we recognize his attentions to Miss Eleanor Browne. He apparently, however, is unaware of his human tendencies and when he receives the call as missionary to the Saskatchewan country, he lays aside all personal ties and is obedient to "the still small voice." He takes up his duties among the Esquimaux and the Indians and soon wins them by his kindness.

George Davis gets a letter from Eleanore Browne's father in which he expresses the undesirability of his daughter marrying a man who is so far removed from civilization and make her home in such a desolate place. The visions of his affianced wife appears and recollections of their happy associations come to him. He will leave on the morrow and claim her; it is a struggle with him between his love of the people, who are so dependent upon him, and his love for Eleanore Browne. But conscience prevails and although he has already started on his homeward journey, he returns a step to the igloo in which his served as a sheltering arm to the inhabitants of the surrounding country. Falling upon his knees, he asks strength from God to continue steadfast in his charge and the glorification of the Lord, committing himself once more his service among the people to whom he has been sent and with whom he determines to live and die for his Master's sake.

SUBDUING OF MRS. NAG (July 14th).—Mrs. Nag objects to her husband having a pretty female stenographer in his office, and tells him not to employ one of his own sex. So Miss Prue, the good-looking stenographer to whom Mrs. Nag objects, dresses in male attire.

On her way to business one morning she sends a bouquet of flowers to Mrs. Nag, with the inscription: "Compliments of an ardent admirer." Miss Prue apprises her boss of her deed, and when Mrs. Nag arrives at his office, he speaks of having another admirer.

Miss Prue is victorious and when we see her in the last scene her own admirable self once more, seated before the typewriter in Mr. Nag's office, with every prospect of being an uninterrupted and permanent employee. Mild and docile, Mrs. Nag modestly enters the office, but offers no objections to remaining unobtrusively waiting for her husband to escort her home.

A GERANIUM (July 15th).—One glance at the poor and disordered home of the Tunisons shows us there is something still lacking. Mrs. Tunison is obliged to provide for her crippled daughter Ethel, her son, who does what he can to help her, and her older daughter, who aids in every way possible.

Daniel Briton, a young peddler, notices Ethel, as he passes by, and gives her one of his wares, a geranium, for which she is very thankful. On successive days as the young peddler passes she wares her hand to him. One day he brings with him a doctor, who takes her to the hospital, where she will get good care and attention.

After a few weeks, Ethel is carried home in the arms of her generous friend, entirely restored to health. Everybody is made happy, and more so with Daniel, who marries one of Ethel's sisters.

beautiful amusement park are shown. Next follows the Ocean Park Bathing Beach; the big pigeon farm, with thousands of birds; the ostrich farm and the alligator farm.

THE UNLOADED GUN.—Eluding the posse galloping madly on his trail, the bandit seeks refuge in the cabin of the miners, Bates and Connoly. Connoly steps outside to wash his face, and Bates enters and is covered by the bandit's gun. The outlaw proceeds to bind his prisoner when Connoly, looking through the window, takes in the situation. Stealthily entering the door towards which the bandit's back is turned, he grabs a shot-gun from the wall and orders the bandit to throw up his hands, and the latter complies. Connoly then releases Bates, and gives him the gun, with which to cow the prisoner, while he gets the sheriff. The officer rides back and takes charge of the bandit. After it is all over Connoly breaks open the gun and to his amazement, discovers that it is empty. The men realize what a close call they had, and the humor of the situation causes them to break into laughter.

AMBROSIO.

SIXTUS THE FIFTH.—Prince Farnese is condemned to death and his wife makes an impassioned appeal to the Pope for his life. Moved by her eloquence and anguish, he cannot refuse her request, and gives her an order to the prison warden to deliver the prince to her at the stroke of two of the castle clock. After she has departed he issues orders to have the execution take place at the stroke of one. The chamberlain betrays this fact to the princess and her page mounts to the high steeple and tampers with the clock so it strikes twice when it should strike once. The ruse is successful and the prince escapes. When Sixtus learns how he has been outwitted, he is very wroth, but before he can take steps to recapture the prince he passes away, the end coming in a sensational scene, as he is surrounded on his throne by the cardinals and ambassadors.

THE EMPEROR'S DEBT.—At Bar-sur-Aube, the battlefield of the allied European forces against Napoleon, a barrel of powder explodes, and Fanfan, a soldier, throws himself in front of Napoleon, saving the life of the Emperor, but being himself wounded and crippled. Returning home he finds that his mother's inability to pay the taxes has resulted in a sale being ordered. As Napoleon rides by in his carriage, Fanfan, dressed in his uniform, stands on the street, and as Napoleon's eyes fall upon him the soldier salutes. Napoleon remembers his face, and making inquiries, learns of Fanfan's predicament, stops the sale of the little home and commissions Fanfan as a lieuteuant.

ECLAIR.

A CHILD'S HEROISM.—While her husband is away, Fernande de Serigny is living happily with her little son, Alain. The wicked Chevalier d'Arlac presumes to court the affections of the lady who spurns him with disdain. d'Arsac, mad with rage, executes a plot for carrying off the lady. Her little son, however, has watched the whole trasaction, unobserved. He recognizes the man, and in his childish way resolves to rescue his mother. He disguises himself as a Troubadour, and, followed by a servant, approaches the castle of d'Arsac. Arriving at the foot of the terrace, the lad sings a sweet melody taught him by his mother, who is a prisoner within. The lady, hearing her child's voice, manages to have him admitted. d'Arsac, however, recognizes the boy, and is about to have him turned out, when the child performs a feat of bravery incredible in one so young, and slays d'Arsac with his own sword. The mother and child escape, and reach their castle just as Serigny is starting to the rescue.

RELIANCE.

THE GOLDEN RULE.—In a moment of weakness a woman permits her husband's friend to kiss her. She instantly regrets her indiscretion, and further advances by the man are firmly checked. It happened, however, that her three year old child, picking up from the table the camera her father had placed there, ran into the garden and snapped a picture. When the husband develops the roll of film he is horrified to find a photograph of his wife in his friend's arms. Suffering from intense grief at the perfidy of his friend and the supposed unfaithfulness of his wife he shows them the picture. With cold dignity he refuses to hear a word of explanation and commands them to leave the house, refusing to permit his wife to kiss their child. She goes to her mother and pathetically sobs out her story, and the next day her old father persuades her to go home and attempt a reconciliation. The husband is seated by the fireplace and the baby is saying its prayers at his knee, bringing a flood of tender recollections of his wife to him. The climax is reached when the baby lisps, "God bless mamma and bring her back to us." Brokenly he murmurs, "My baby's mother! Have I been too harsh in my judgment?" Silently the wife enters, and gliding to his side drops down on her knees and clasps her arms about him. Gazing into her eyes he sees naught but purity and love, and with a quick movement he gathers baby and mother into his arms and strains them to his breast.

AMERICAN.

THE SCHOOLMA'AM OF SNAKE.—Miss Porter, the new schoolma'am of Snake, had two admirers one week casually waiting for her at the mouth of the day to escort her home. Of the two she favored Carlos Mercer and gradually George Wade seemed to have the more formidable rival. One evening the two men are waiting together for Miss Porter. Where she appears she greets George kindly and taking the arm of Carlos they start away. George is undecided for a moment, but with determination he follows the lovers. Trailing long behind them, he witnesses a little love scene and learns them plan to elopement for the following day.

In his jealous rage George lays a plan to circumvent them. Returning to the ranch he tells the boss he wants Dunn to kidnap the teacher and take her to a rendezvous in the mountains. He will bring the minister there and compel the teacher to marry him.

The next day he goes to the minister's home and lures him away on the pretext that one of the boys is very ill and has sent for him.

Was it accident or stupid that prompted Auntie to visit Miss Burton's school in the morning? Miss Burton thinks her visit most inopportune, but at the close of the morning session, when Auntie takes her departure, she is kidnapped by the cowboys, who think they have the teacher. The teacher realizes that she was to have been the victim instead of Auntie, but determines to await the arrival of Carley ere going to her Aunt's rescue.

The cowboys carry the struggling aunt to the lumberyard and drive away to meet the minister and the waiting George. In the meantime Carley arrives at the school and learns from his sweetheart what has taken place.

They come upon the party in the mountains, to find Auntie belaboring the kidnappers with her umbrella, and George and Dunn fight under her friendly onslaught. Finding the minister there, the lovers decide to wait no longer, and joining hands before the parson, he pronounces the words that make them one, and Auntie in her happiness caresses them all.

THE LUNCH CHICKEN.—Rastus Johnson and his wife, Dinah, live near the Circle C Ranch, and Dinah does the washing for the cowboys.

As Rastus is very fond of color when the chickens begin to disappear from the ranch-yard, the boss naturally suspects him. One day as Dinah is taking the washing to her home, the boys stretch a rope across her path, tripping her. A number of the best pullets belonging to the ranch escape from her basket. Stupified is now a certainty and the boss, together with his fun-loving companions go after the chicken-stealing darkies a lasting scare. In Dinah's basket, left behind in her haste to get away, a number of sheets are found, and knowing a darkey's fear of supernatural manifestations, the boss and his cowboys array themselves in ghostly attire for the next eventful night.

Dinah, on her return home, tells Rastus of her disaster at the ranch, and they determine to return to the ranch that night and recover the pullets. Dinah does not want to go, but Rastus is insistent, so with many misgivings she consents to go along.

Arrived at the ranch, Dinah seats herself on a barrel near the cook-house window, while Rastus enters the coop to hand out the pullets to Dinah and her waiting sack. They are busily engaged when a long, unearthly wail strikes dread to their souls.

And then a ghostly form comes upon Rastus in the coop and with a shriek of mortal terror he dives from the window headlong and rushes away.

Dinah follows him, leaving her hated fowls away, as other ghosts surround her. The ghosts go behind the coop and removing their sheets, the cowboys roll on the ground with mirth.

To compensate the old couple for the entertainment he has enjoyed at their expense, the boss selects a fine pullet from his lot and going to the darkies' cabin, he gains the roof and listens to the talk of hoodoos, witches, charms, etc., of his superstitious neighbors. Then he lets his pullet down by a string. Rastus is in the act of trying to explain to Dinah why he did not assist her from the scene of their recent scare, when he spies the pullet dangling near his head.

Believing it to be a gift from the gods, he grasps it, and a pair of extremely happy darkies are shown, trying to outgrin each other.

CUPID IN CHAPS.—The cowboys of Circle Bar Ranch are much annoyed by the forwardness of the hired girl, who enforces all sorts of tricks to get one of them to marry her.

At the country store, the boys meet a "preach," and as she is laden with bundles, each one of them wants to relieve her of her burden.

One day the boys invite her to their ranch. Here she spurns the attentions. If he love at first sight and, it might be said, they eventually get married, much to the surprise of the boys.

THE OUTLAW'S TRAIL.—Dad Winters is the leader of a gang of outlaws. Jim Osborn, a lieutenant in the Texas Rangers, is assigned to capture him. At a spring in the mountains he stops to take a drink. While thus engaged, the daughter of Dad Winters comes for a pail of water. Jim helps her draw it.

CHAMPION.

TONY WOULD BE A COWBOY.—To begin with, the young lad wants to go West. His long-haired associates mocking lessons in every corner of office. So Slade them with a scrap, drives and pets and leaves like a whole tribe of Arabs.

There was employer coming in, beats him and he has to wait it. However, not before several westerns had around the same employer's head.

We see him on the prairie doing some stunts. A cowboy picture has started him on his mad career. He rides over the heads of the audience and dances a jig on the piano keys, while the fair maidens ducks down in wild alarm at his hilarious antics and freakish demonstrations. In a quick movement now puts in an appearance, and lifting him bodily in his arms, ejects him from the theatre. So as he is fired, off he goes and down like a frisky fellow, sending his favorite "Yellow and Black" flying.

We next see him at a costumers, knocking things topsy-turvy, and then he goes forth in true Western style for the land of the Golden Sunset. Out in the Western wilds he gives full swing to his mischievous infancy. He startles the natives red and white, by the hideous exhibitions he makes from time to time, of his distorted imagination, and which finds vent and form in seemingly and rough ridings as novel as they are amusing and as startling as they are novel.

FROM WALLACE TO GRANT.—It was at Shiloh, Grand Battleship Landing, the 6th and 7th of April, 1862. Albert S. Johnson, at the head of his troops, had driven the enemy almost into the river. Grant, on his way up the river, had ordered General Lew Wallace, who was at Crump's Landing, 5th him in case he should be attacked. Grant on the left, which they did. As he proceeded, however, Wallace found that he had him in the midst of the Confederates, and that he must recover his steps, but General Grant must be notified of the situation.

A volunteer was called for, and Geo Hurlburt, a colonel of the general of the same name, was seen to ride off on horseback with the despatches. A band of Confederate cavalry was seen in hot pursuit, at great speed he swung from his horse to a overhanging limb of a tree, and his horse sped on. His pursuers followed the riderless steed. Colonel Hurlburt came down and made for the river. Having discovered the ruse the soldiers quickly turned and made for the mounted gun boat, plunged in and swam to the other side, where they did. As he proceeded, however, Wallace found that he led —A young business man was assisted by his attention to his work, built up energetic feeling and applies too advice to a physician who was a friend of the family. The doctor assures that medical assortments is needed not to save him from contracting tuberculosis, and prescribes a patient to move to the country, sleep out of doors and live the simple life, assuring him that if he faithfully obeys his directions that he will soon be well.

WHEN A MAN FEARS

The patient does as directed. He pitches his tent in a rainy district, and thoroughly enjoys himself while fishing from day to day time he is growing stronger. Incidentally he falls in love.

Motographic Progress.

The reason for this unqualified success and all-compelling popularity of the photoplay is directly traceable to the average film manufacturer, who is forever trying to give the public something better and something new, regardless of cost.

The newest wrinkle in moving pictures has been but recently invented and patented by David Horsley, general manager of the Nestor Film Company, and is now being used in conjunction with that other praiseworthy novelty, the Mutt and Jeff photo farces.

Mr. Horsley's invention, herewith illustrated, is a sort of footnotes arrangement, perfectly simple and simply perfect and comfortably fills a long-felt want. It has been hailed with delight and approval by audiences wherever advance prints of Mutt and Jeff have been shown. To date there's nothing to equal this happy device, as one may with ease follow the story on the screen and enjoy every inch of it without the bothersome breaks caused by sub-titles.

Which Would YOU Rather Pay?
This man is on a 220 volt circuit and as his moving picture lamp only requires 35 volts he has to waste the surplus voltage. He pays for it this way he used for about 3 times as much "juice" as he actually needed.
Then he figured he needed this money more than the Lighting Company and he bought a
FORT WAYNE COMPENSARC
Now he gets a clearer, whiter, more intense unflickering light and his bills are only about 1/3 what they were before. The machine has three adjustments and the circuit can not break for even an instant in passing from one to another. No clears, no hashes, no scales, no danger, no heat.
Send today for our booklet "Compensarc vs. Rheostat." It tells you how you can get a much better light at 1/3 the cost.

Remember That Awful Fire

that destroyed the Lakeview school house at North Collinwood, Cleveland, O., back in 1908? One hundred and seventy-four lives were lost (nearly all little children) just for lack of proper fastenings on the fire-exit doors. That couldn't have happened with the Von Duprin Safe-Releasing Fire Exit Latch in use, because in that case the first child who touched the door would have opened it, just by that touch, and those precious young lives would have been saved.

Won't you try the Von Duprin now, and learn for yourself that it cannot fail? Catalog on request.

A Story of Facts

WE maintain when constructing a machine for a a given purpose, it is absolutely important that attention be devoted to design as well as serviceable quality.

DID YOU EVER KNOW A REALLY FIRST-CLASS MECHANIC satisfied to operate a heavy, cumbersome and noise-racking machine, WHEN HE KNEW there was another machine for exactly the same purpose, so constructed as to combine equal service with Beauty of Design, Accessibility of Parts, Ease of Operation and Noiseless Running AND PROJECTING THE MOST PERFECT PICTURE?

THE FIRST MOTIOGRAPH WAS A SUCCESS and is still a success, being in constant daily use, and giving as good a picture today as it did four years ago.

Every day the MOTIOGRAPH is replacing well-known machines of other makes, and we offer it ONLY ON ITS MERITS.
